Consular convention with Bulgaria.—Establishes firm obligations on such important matters as free communications between a citizen and his consul, notification of consular officers of the arrest and detention of their citizens, and permission for visits by consuls on those so detained and authorizes the consuls of both countries to perform the customary wide variety of other consular services which contribute to the improvement of both governmental and commercial interaction between countries. Ex. H. 93d-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to Dec. 16, 1974. (525)

Convention prohibiting bacteriological and toxin weapons.—Seeks to prohibit the development, production, stockpiling, acquisition or retention of biological agents or toxins, of types and in quantities that have no justification for peaceful purposes, as well as weapons, equipment and means of delivery designed to use such agents or toxins for hostile purposes or in armed conflict. Ex. Q. 92d-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to Dec. 16, 1974. (523)

Geneva Protocol.—Seeks to prohibit (1) the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials, or devices and, (2) the use of bacteriological methods of warfare. Ex. J. 91st-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to Dec. 16, 1974. (522)

December 19, 1974

International Maritime Traffic Convention amendment.—Provides a "tacit amendment" procedure for approving changes in the Annex to the Convention which sets forth the implementing standards and recommended practices for simplifying and making as uniform as possible the documentary and other formalities required of ships on arriving at or clearing ports relating to customs, immigration, public health and other requirements. Ex. D. 93d-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to Dec. 16, 1974. (524)

Protocol to the Convention for the International Council for Exploration of the Sea.—Amends the Convention for the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea to require a two-thirds majority vote of members of the Council to approve its annual budget rather than a simple majority vote as now required. Ex. V. 93d-1st. Resolution of ratification agreed to Sept. 4, 1974. (361)

Protocols for the Extension of the International Wheat Agreement, 1971.—Extends to June 30, 1975, the provisions of the International Wheat Agreement, 1971 constituting (1) the Wheat Trade Convention which provides for the continued operation of the International Wheat Council, an administrative body established for the purpose of providing a mechanism for international cooperation in matters relating to the production and sale of wheat, and (2) the Food Aid Convention which commits its parties to provide minimum annual quantities of food to developing countries. Ex. C. 93d-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to June 21, 1974. (260)

Vietnam war claims.—Increases the rate of detention benefits under the War Claims Act of 1948, as amended, to civilian American citizens held as prisoners in Southeast Asia, from $60 per month to $150 per month; retains provisions of present law giving priority to the payment in full of the remaining individual awards for property losses arising out of World War II, and second priority to the payment of corporate awards for similar losses up to a level of $50,000 with such payments to be awarded in equal amounts up to $35,000 and amends the law to provide that claimants not paid in full will receive payments in an amount which will be the same for each award or in an amount of the award, whichever is less; places a $250,000 limit on the total payment to an individual under this section; and provides that the balance of amounts in the War Claims Fund will be used to make pro rata payments on the remaining individual and corporate claims. S. 1728. Public Law 93-475, approved Oct. 26, 1974. (VV)

1980 Winter Olympic Games.—Extends an invitation to the International Olympic Committee to hold the 1980 winter games at Lake Placid, New York; expresses the hope that the United States will be selected as the site for these games; and pledges cooperation and support in their successful fulfillment provided that Olympic activities and plans fit within present State laws and plans respecting the Adirondack Park. S. Con. Res. 72. Senate adopted Apr. 8, 1974; House adopted amended Aug. 5, 1974; Senate agreed to House amendment Aug. 21, 1974. (VV)

World food.—States as a sense of the Senate that the United States should take the lead in a cooperative international effort to meet the production of adequate quantities of food; calls upon the President and the Secretaries of State and Agriculture to give priority to the expansion of American food aid by restoring sales and grants under Public Law 480 to their 1972 commodity levels and taking additional steps to transfer food on concessional and donation terms to those nations most severely affected by the recent price rises and shortages in energy, fertilizer, and food and to undertake negotiations to obtain the participation of other food-exporting countries in an expanded food aid effort and financial assistance from the oil-exporting countries for those nations most affected by current shortages and rising prices; states the need for international efforts to increase world fertilizer production; and calls upon the President to encourage domestic conservation of fertilizer by a reduction in non-food producing uses. S. Res. 329. Senate adopted Aug. 7, 1974. (VV)

World food and population.—States the sense of the Senate that pursuant to the initial steps taken at the World Food and World Population Conferences, the United States should cooperate fully and energetically with other nations to implement effective national and international policies on food production, storage, and distribution and on population growth. S. Res. 440. Senate adopted Dec. 3, 1974. (VV)

World hunger.—States a sense of the Senate that beginning Thanksgiving Day, 1974, and ending Thanksgiving Day, 1975, the U.S. should identify with the hungry people of the world by self-sacrifice and sharing through the practice of fasting; encourages individuals to share any moneys saved sacrificially with the starving people; and designates the Monday of Thanksgiving week, November 24, 1975, as a National Day of Fasting. S. Res. 437. Senate adopted Nov. 26, 1974. (VV)

Customs convention on the international transit of goods.—Provides simplified customs control mechanisms and uniform documentation procedures for transport by bonded trailers, railway cars, vessels, and large containers, such carriers to have the option to use the International Transit of Goods procedures or another system if more advantageous. Ex. P. 93d-1st. Resolution of ratification agreed to Jan. 21, 1974. (2)

Czechoslovak Consular Convention.—Establishes consular relations between the United States and Czechoslovakia, including the issuance of passports and visas, performance of notarial services, and representation of the interests of the sending state in estate matters; assures that consuls, whose nationals have been detained will be notified within 3 days and will have the right to visit them and provide legal assistance; and contains other provisions. Ex. A. 93d-2d. Resolution of ratification agreed to Sept. 30, 1974. (406)

Extradition Treaty with Denmark.—Provides for the extradition of fugitives charged with any of 28 specific offenses, including offenses relating to narcotics and aircraft hijacking, as well as conspiracy to commit any of the specified offenses; defines territorial application to include territorial waters and airspace as well as registered aircraft in flight; provides for extradition for offenses committed outside the territory of either party if the offense is punishable under the laws of both parties; provides discretionary power to either party to extradite its own nationals, with the requested state to try the individual when the offense is punishable under its own laws; and permits refusal of extradition unless assurances are received that the death penalty will not be imposed for an offense not punishable by death in the country from which extradition is requested. Ex. U. 93d-1st. Resolution of ratification agreed to Mar. 29, 1974. (92)

Missing newsmen.—States as the sense of the Senate that the President should make every possible diplomatic effort through the Department of State and other relevant agencies to ascertain the truth of the present whereabouts or fate of United States newsmen missing in Southeast Asia, and obtain the release of those still alive and an accounting of those who may be dead. S. Res. 291. Senate adopted Feb. 28, 1974. (VV)

in the quadrennial world Olympic Games, (2) conduct a review and oversight of the past performance of the United States Olympic Committee (USOC) in managing U.S. involvement in the Games, (3) examine ways to improve the management of U.S. involvement in the Games, and (4) submit a report of its recommendations to the President and Congress not later than December 31, 1974, or 180 days after the appointment of the ninth member of the Commission, whichever is later; and authorizes therefor $750,000. S. 1018. P/S May 20, 1974. (VV)

Northeast Atlantic Fisheries.—Permits U.S. participation in international enforcement of fish conservation in additional geographic areas pursuant to the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries of 1949; requires payment for travel expenses and per diem incident to attendance at meetings of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries for not more than five members of the industry advisory commission; and requires the Secretary of State to submit an annual report to Congress on the costs incurred to reimburse advisor's expenses. H.R. 14291. Public Law 93-339, approved July 10, 1974. (VV)

Turkey foreign aid.—Authorizes the President to suspend provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Foreign Military Sales Act and H.J. Res. 1131, the Continuing resolution (which require a cut-off of military aid to Turkey because of hostilities on Cyprus) until December 15, 1974, if such a suspension will further negotiations for a peaceful resolution of the Cyprus conflict. S.J. Res. 247. P/S Oct. 9, 1974; House failed to pass Oct. 11, 1974. (449)

United Nations peacekeeping contribution.—Authorizes such sums as may be necessary for the payment of the United States share of the expenses of the United Nations peacekeeping forces in the Middle East for the period beginning November 1, 1974; authorizes an additional $19.8 million supplemental payment for the period prior to November 1, 1974, to meet the U.S. share of peacekeeping expenses in excess of those originally anticipated; and designates the Secretary of State as the official to whom these funds would be paid in order to expedite payment of the U.S. contribution. H.R. 16982. P/H Nov. 18, 1974; P/S amended Dec. 18, 1974. (VV)

U.S.-Hungarian claims.—Amends the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, as amended, to implement the provisions of the claims agreement between the United States and Hungary, signed March 6, 1973, which provides for the payment of $18.9 million (in 20 equal installments of $945,000) by the Hungarian Government "in full and final settlement" of all claims of American nationals against Hungary for war damage, nationalization, expropriation and other taking of property. H.R. 13261. Public Law 93-460, approved Oct. 20, 1974. (VV)

LABOR

Developmentally disabled assistance.—Extends and improves the programs initiated under the Developmental Disabilities Services and Facilities Construction Act (Public Law 91-517) for 5 years, through June 30, 1979; adds a new program to facilitate the achievement of standards by residential and community facilities in order to protect the rights of mentally retarded and other developmental disabled persons; improves care in residential facilities; and contains other provisions. H.R. 14215. P/H July 11, 1974; P/S amended Oct. 1, 1974; in conference. (VV)

Emergency unemployment compensation.—Creates a new temporary 2-year Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program modeled after the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act of 1971; provides an emergency 13 weeks of unemployment benefits to workers who have exhausted their 26 weeks of regular benefits and 13 weeks of extended benefits; makes it easier for States to qualify for the so-called extended benefits programs by lowering the national trigger of 4.5 percent insured unemployment to 4 percent and by waiving the State requirement that unemployment be going up by 20 percent over the previous 2 years; and contains other provisions. H.R. 17597. P/H Dec. 12, 1974; P/S amended Dec. 16, 1974. (527)

Farm labor contractor registration.—Amends and extends the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act of 1963 through fiscal year 1979; deletes the limitation of coverage by including intrastate as well as interstate transactions; requires that a grower observe a registration certificate in the possession of the contractor before dealing with him; broadens the information requirement that the farm labor contractor must provide migrant workers with regard to the nature of the worker's prospective employment and requires that such information be in a prescribed written form and a language in which the worker is fluent; requires farm labor contractors to establish proof that their vehicles and property comply with Federal and State health and safety standards; increases the minimum amounts for vehicle insurance to those applicable to vehicles operating under the Interstate Commerce Act unless otherwise set by the Secretary of Labor; creates a Federal civil remedy for persons aggrieved by violations of the Act; provides the Secretary of Labor with powers of subpoena and examination similar to that provided under the Fair Labor Standards Act; increases civil penalties and sets criminal penalties for violations of the Act; reclassifies hearing officer positions within the Department of Labor and under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act and the members of the Benefits Review Board established by the Longshoremen's Amendments of 1972; and contains other provisions. H.R. 13342. Vetted Oct. 29, 1974. (VV)

Contains similar provisions as the vetoed bill, H.R. 13342, with several minor changes; requires a determination by a grower that a contractor possesses a certificate of registration before dealing with him; exempts certain people who traditionally assist in picking or harvesting crops on a temporary or short-hand basis from the registration requirements under this Act if such employment does not exceed 13 weeks per year; provides both civil and criminal penalties for violations of the Act; and deletes provisions reclassifying hearing officer positions within the Department of Labor and under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act and the members of the Benefits Review Board established by the Longshoremen's Amendments of 1972. S. 3202. Public Law 93—, approved Dec. 7, 1974. (VV)

Minimum wage increase.—Provides a statutory minimum wage of $2.30 an hour for all covered workers according to the following time schedule:

For those covered prior to 1966, $2.00 on the effective date of this act, $2.10 effective January 1, 1975, and $2.30 effective January 1, 1976;

For nonagricultural employees first covered by the 1966 and 1974 amendments, $1.90 on the effective date of this act, $2.00 effective January 1, 1975, $2.20 effective January 1, 1976, and $2.30 effective January 1, 1977;

For agricultural employees, $1.60 on the effective date of this act, $1.80 effective January 1, 1975, $2.00 effective January 1, 1976, $2.20 effective January 1, 1977, and $2.30 effective January 1, 1978;

Extension of coverage.—Extends coverage of the act to employees of individual retail and service establishments (except "Mom and Pop" stores) which are part of enterprises with gross annual receipts of more than $250,000 (thus including individual establishments with gross receipts of less than $250,000 if they are part of a chain with annual receipts over $250,000) with the $250,000 establishment test for smaller stores of large covered chains to be phased out by July 1, 1978.

Brings under the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Act all employees in private household domestic service earning "wages" ($50 per quarter) for purposes of the Social Security Act, but retains a minimum wage and overtime exemption for casual babysitters and companions and an overtime exemption for live-in domestic service employees;

Extends coverage of Federal employees to most employees including wage board employees, non-appropriated fund employees, certain employees in the Canal Zone and any other civilian employee working for the armed services; and extends coverage of State and local government employees;

Retains the present basis for coverage of agricultural employees, which requires at least 500 man-days (one-man-day being any day during which an employee performs any agricultural labor for not less than one hour) during the peak quarter of the preceding year, but alters the computation of man-days by adding to the definition of "employee" the previously excluded group of all local, seasonal hand-harvest laborers, with such employees and farmworkers under 16 working with a parent continuing to be exempt from the minimum wage if they are paid the adult piece rate;

Child Farm Labor: Amends the Fair Labor Standards Act by prohibiting the employment in agriculture of all children under the age of 12, except those working on farms owned or operated by their parents, or on farms not covered by the act under the 500 man-day test, or on conglomerate farms, with parental consent required for children on noncovered farms; permits children ages 12 through 15 to work only during hours school is not in session, provided that all 12 and 13 years olds must either receive written parental consent or work only on farms where their parents are employed;

Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands: Provides for the gradual achievement of minimum wage parity for workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands with workers on the mainland as follows:

For certain hotel, motel, restaurant and food-service employees, as well as employees of the Federal and Virgin Islands Governments, the same as the minimum wage for counter-part mainland employees on the effective date;

For other covered workers, effective on the effective date of the legislation, presently covered employees are to receive: (A) an increase of 12 cents an hour if their wage order rates are less than $1.40 an hour, and (B) an increase of 15 cents an hour if their wage order rates are $1.40 an hour or higher;

For newly covered employees (including commonwealth and municipal employees), wage rates to be set by the special industry committees which may not be less than 60 percent of the otherwise applicable rate under section 6(b) or $1.00 an hour, whichever is greater;

For all employees (other than commonwealth and municipal employees), yearly increases beginning one year after the effective date of this legislation as follows: (A) 12 cents an hour yearly if their wage order rates are less than $1.40 and (B) 15 cents an hour yearly if their wage order rates are $1.40 an hour, whichever is greater;

Exemptions.—Repeals or modifies a number of present exemptions, including some of the complete minimum wage and overtime exemptions as well as some which apply only to the overtime standard, in relation to: motion picture theaters, small logging crews, shade-grown tobacco, agricultural processing industries, railroads, and pipelines, seafood processing, local transit, hotels, motels, and restaurants, tip allowance, nursing homes, salesmen, partsmen, and mechanics, cotton ginning and sugar processing, catering and food service employees, telegraphic message operations, bowling establishments, and house parents for orphans; sets a certain overtime exemption for police;

In retail and service establishments of not less than 85 percent of the applicable minimum wage of $1.60, whichever is higher for a period of up to 20 hours per week, and permits the hiring of up to 4 students without the need for the traditional recertification procedure;

In agriculture, the higher of 85 percent of the applicable rate or $1.30 an hour for the same period, and up to 4 students without certification;

And in higher education institutions, 85 percent of the applicable rate of $1.60 for the same period;

Provides that the Secretary of Labor, to the extent necessary to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by regulation or orders provide for the employment of learners, apprentices, and for messengers employed primarily in delivering letters and messages, under special certificates at lower wages;

Age Discrimination.—Amends the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 to include within its coverage Federal, State and local government employees (other than elected officials and certain aides not covered by civil service), and to expand coverage from employers with 25 or more employees to employers with 20 or more employees; and contains other provisions. S. 2747. Public Law 93-259, approved Apr. 8, 1974. (58,85)

Nonprofit hospital employees.—Extends coverage under the National Labor Relations Act to employees of private nonprofit hospitals; establishes certain new procedures governing labor relations in health care institutions (which is defined to include hospitals, nursing homes, health maintenance organizations, extended care facilities, health and medical clinics and other similar institutions caring for the sick, infirm or aged); exempts health care institution employees who object to joining labor organizations on religious grounds from union membership if they make comparable payments to a non-religious charitable fund; and contains several provisions designed to facilitate collective bargaining settlement and to provide advance notice of any strike or picketing involving a health care institution by requiring: (1) a 90-day notice of termination or expiration of a contract; (2) a 60-day notice to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) of such termination or expiration; (3) a 30-day notice of a dispute to FMCS in initial contract negotiations; (4) the health care institution and labor organization to participate in mediation at the direction of the FMCS; and (5) a 10-day notice to the health care institution before any picketing or strike (whether or not related to bargaining) can take place; and by permitting the FMCS (within 30 days after the notice of a contract expiration or within 10 days after the notice of new contract negotiations) to convene an impartial board of inquiry to help settle a potential or existing labor dispute and to report thereon within 15 days. S. 3203. Public Law 93-380, approved July 26, 1974. (177, 280)

Public service employment.—Establishes a one-year $2.5 billion public service employment program to provide approximately 530,000 jobs in all areas of the country for persons unemployed during the current economic crisis by enlarging the current public service employment program under the Comprehensive sive Employment and Training Act of 1973 (CETA); establishes a 1-year $2.5 million special unemployment assistance program to provide unemployment assistance payments to unemployed workers who would not otherwise be eligible for such assistance under any other State or Federal unemployment compensation law; authorizes $500 million for a job opportunities program to provide emergency financial assistance to stimulate maintain or expand job creating activities in areas, both urban and rural, which are suffering from unusually high levels of unemployment; and contains other provisions. H.R. 16596 (S. 4079). Public Law 93—, approved 1974. (504)

Vocational rehabilitation.—Amends the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 to extend for 1 year the authorizations throughout the Act; transfers the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA) from the Social and Rehabilitation Service into the Office of the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare; requires that the RSA Commissioner be confirmed by the Senate and that he report directly to the Secretary, Under Secretary or an appropriate assistant Secretary; prohibits the delegation of programs and administrative functions vested in the Commissioner to any officer not directly responsible to him;

Makes certain clarifying amendments to more effectively express the original Congressional intent that the nondiscrimination provisions of section 504 were not limited to employment but are of general application and the provisions of both section 504 and of section 503, affirmative action, were not limited to the individual's potential benefit from vocational rehabilitation services;

Eliminates fiscal years 1976 and 1977 funding restrictions for client assistance projects; extends to June 30, 1975, the date on which the Secretary is to submit a report on the study of service needs for individuals with the most severe handicaps; authorizes grants for demonstrations of architectural and engineering designs for handicapped individuals; assigns the Office of the Handicapped (renamed the Office for Handicapped Individuals) to the office of the Secretary or Under Secretary of HEW;

Adds the Department of Defense as a member of the Architectural and Transportation Barriers Compliance Board and makes the Secretary of HEW the Chairman of the Board; requires a Consumer Advisory Panel composed of a majority of handicapped individuals; authorizes the Board to carry out its functions by grant or contract; makes a Board order binding on any Federal agency; authorizes the withholding of funds for buildings not in compliance;

Amends the Randolph-Sheppard Act in order to strengthen the provisions for the establishment and protection of blind vending operations on Federal property;

Calls upon the President to convene a White House Conference on the Handicapped to make recommendations for further research and action in the field of the handicapped;

And contains other provisions. H.R. 14225. Vetted Oct. 29, 1974. House overrode veto Nov. 20, 1974; Senate overrode veto Nov. 21, 1974. (472)

H.R. 17503 (identical to H.R. 14225). Public Law 93-516, approved Dec. 7, 1974. (VV)

West Coast dock strike.—Provides that no strike or lockout in the longshore or maritime industry in the States of Washington, Oregon, or California shall be permitted to interrupt normal shipping, for a period of 160 days beginning on the first day of the strike or lockout, from any port on the West Coast to Hawaii, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Guam, or American Samoa, for from Hawaii or any U.S. Pacific Island to any port on the West Coast; permits employees or labor organizations who are parties to labor disputes, or the chief executive officers of the island government, to petition any U.S. District Court with jurisdiction to issue an injunction or temporary restraining order to enforce the 160-day prohibition which would be in addition to any 80-day "cooling off" period which might be invoked under Title II of the Labor Management Relations (Taft-Hartley) Act, thus providing a possible total of 240 days postponement of any disruption of West Coast-Hawaii waterborne commerce; and provides that the wage rates established in the agreement settling the dispute be made retroactive to cover work done during the 160-day moratorium. Veterans' and Servicemen's Automobile and Adaptive Equipment.—Amends chapter 39, title 3, U.S.C., to raise from $2,800 to $3,300 the maximum allowance for the purchase of specially equipped automobiles for eligible disabled veterans and servicemen; extends benefits under this chapter to veterans who served during the "peace time" periods between January 1, 1947, to June 26, 1950, and February 1, 1955, to August 4, 1964; improves a number of aspects of the program relating to the definition and provision of adaptive equipment; allows the VA Administrator to contract for driver training and arrange for areawide sharing of driver training personnel and necessary adaptive equipment needed when training is completed; urges the VA to request and expend all the funds necessary to achieve compliance with Public Law 91-666 which directed the VA to establish adaptive equipment safety standards; and authorizes the VA to carry out an expanded program of research and development in coordination with the Rehabilitation Services Administration in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to carry out an expanded program of research and development in the field of adaptive equipment, adapted conveyances, and rehabilitation devices to help handicapped veterans become as independent as possible. S. 2363. Public Law 93- , approved 1974. (VV)

Veterans and Survivors Pension Adjustments.—Amends title 38, U.S.C. to liberalize the provisions relating to payment of disability and death pension and dependency and indemnity compensation; increases the maximum annual income limitations for eligible veterans and their survivors receiving pension by $400 and provides an average 12 percent increase in the rates of pension; increases the maximum annual income limitations of "old law" pensioners by $400; increases the maximum annual income dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) and provides an average 12 percent increase in the rates for DIC; increases the allowances payable for those in receipt of pension in need of aid and attendance or who are deemed to be housebound by 12 percent; provides pension benefits for widows and children of certain veterans whose death occurred not in the line of duty but who had previous "honorable service"; provides reinstatement eligibility for benefit purposes to the child of a veteran whose marriage has been terminated by death or divorce; authorizes a study by the Veterans' Administration of the economic situation in terms of income and needs of veterans age 72 or older to be submitted to the Congress not later than 180 days after the beginning of the 90th Congress; and provides that the Act will become effective on January 1, 1975. S. 4040. Public Law 93- , approved 1974. (VV)

Veterans' Home Loans.—Permits the restoration of a veteran's entitlement to a guaranteed, insured, or a direct loan provided any prior GI loan has been paid in full and the property has been disposed of by the veterans or any immediate veteran-transferee has agreed to assume the outstanding balance on the loan and has consented to the use of his veteran's entitlement, permits the guarantee of loans by the Veterans' Administration (VA) on an automatic basis in the case of unsupervised lenders such as consumer credit institutions, finance companies and mortgage companies who meet VA regulatory standards; increases the maximum of condominium units eligible for VA guarantee by authorizing the guarantee of loans for individual condominium units without the present prerequisite the Department of Housing and Urban Development has issued insurance on at least one loan in the project; increases the maximum loan guarantee for single-wide mobile home loans from $10,000 to $12,500; authorizes the guarantee of used mobile home units which meet VA minimum requirements for construction, design and general acceptability; amends the Federal Credit Union Act to increase the maximum maturity of loans made by Federal Credit Unions; makes the mobile home loan guarantee program permanent; increases the maximum grant payable for specially adapted housing for certain seriously service-connected disabled veterans from $17,500 to $25,000; extends the eligibility for "insured loans" to veterans whose service in the Armed Forces occurred after January 31, 1955; and contains other provisions. H.R. 15912. Public Law 93- , approved 1974. (506)

*Vietnam Veterans Education.—Liberalizes eligibility requirements for disabled Vietnam and post-Korean conflict veterans to receive training under the vocational rehabilitation program to equalize them with those in effect for veterans of World War II and the Korean conflict by increasing the monthly educational assistance allowances by 22.7 percent (an increase for the single veteran with no dependents from $220 to $270 for full-time institutional study) and increasing the monthly vocational rehabilitation subsistence and training assistance allowances by 18.2 percent; requires a study by the Veterans Administration of the desirability of a tuition assistance allowance program and a report to the President and Congress within 12 months; liberalizes the circumstances under which service-connected disabled veterans training under the vocational rehabilitation program may qualify for individualized tutorial assistance by extending the maximum assistance period from 9 to 12 months and increasing the maximum assistance allowance from $50 to $60; provides up to 9 months additional entitlement to educational assistance for eligible veterans pursuing a standard undergraduate degree; authorizes up to 6 months of refresher training for veterans with current GI bill eligibility in order to update knowledge and skills in their fields of employment; liberalizes the veteran student service programs by raising the maximum work-study allowance from $250 to $500 to $625, increasing the maximum hours a Veteran student may work from 100 to 250, removing any statutory ceiling on the number of veterans permitted to participate in this program, and limiting to $250 the amount of the work-study program which a veteran may receive in advance; establishes a veterans representative program to station a full time VA employee at each education institution where at least 500 veterans are enrolled; authorizes direct VA loans of up to $600 a year utilizing the same entitlement as applies to the VA loan guarantee revolving fund under section 1824 of title 38 U.S.C. to cover educational costs not otherwise provided for; extends chapter 41 benefits (job counseling, training, and placement services) to wives and widows eligible for educational assistance; and contains other provisions. H.R. 12628 (S. 2784). Vetted Nov. 26, 1974. House overrode veto Dec. 3, 1974; Senate overrode veto Dec. 3, 1974; became Public Law 93-508, without approval Dec. 3, 1974. (252,488)

OUTSTANDING JOB BY SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD AS SENATE MAJORITY WHIP

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I take this opportunity as we come to the close of the 93d Congress, to pay tribute to Senator ROBERT C. BYRD for his outstanding performance as majority whip of the Senate.

Senator BYRD has a well-deserved reputation for diligence and hard work in expediting action on an unusually complex and heavy legislative program in this Congress with our distinguished majority leader, Senator MANSFIELD. He has consistently made every effort to give fair consideration to the requests of his colleagues on legislative matters.

However, it is important right now to give recognition to the fine job of our majority whip during this so-called lameduck, post election session of Congress, when he has had the responsibility for moving the Senate through its calendar of business. I salute him for his tireless efforts and statesmanship in achieving consensus on the completion of action on numerous bills of vital importance to the Nation. The Senate and the country are indebted to Senator BYRD for his dedication to the responsibilities of public service.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an excellent article on Senator BYRD, appearing in the December 15 issue of the Washington Post, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BYRD RESHAPES HIS IMAGE—SENATE WHIP'S POWER GROWS ALMOST DAILY
(By Spencer Rich)

When Robert C. Byrd (D-W. Va.) came to the Senate in 1959, he was viewed by many liberals as a racist yokel with a Klan background, a secretive manner and a bad education.

A decade later, as he began helping Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) with boring little routine chores around the Senate floor he was snidely described as the Senate's "garbageman" or a "Hillbilly Uriah Heep" eager to ingratiate himself with his more statesmanlike colleagues.

Today, though still subordinate to Mansfield, Byrd has become one of the half-dozen most powerful men in the entire Congress. In 1971 he shocked complacent liberals by ousting Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) as Senate Democratic whip, 31 to 24, on the strength of Southern and border-state votes and a proxy from the revered, dying Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) that still hangs framed in Byrd's office.

His power is growing every day. He is universally credited with doing an excellent, assiduous job as whip—assistant leader. Mansfield calls him "the best whip the Senate has ever had."

He is one step from moving up to majority leader at such time as the 71-year-old Mansfield decides to step down, although Byrd may face a challenge from liberals who dislike his conservative views and his tendency to reach for control over everything.

Moreover, he has declared himself "not uninterested" in the presidency as a middle-of-the-road Democratic darkhorse in case of a 1976 convention deadlock. While he has no campaign organization, and is suspected by many of putting himself forward for President principally to enhance his stature for a future majority leader contest, those who have watched his progress in accumulating power are reluctant to discount him entirely.

Byrd's status in the Senate should not be overstated. The power of any Senate leader is circumscribed. He can wheedle, cajole, threaten a bit, build up credit by doing people favors, influence events by knowing more and working harder than others. But it is nothing at all like the President's power to order the entire Executive Branch about.

Byrd works within these limitations and he also is clearly second-in-command to Mansfield, the major spokesman and policy maker on national issues within the Senate Democratic group.

Others feel he has an excessive ego. Ritualistically and self-satisfiedly he intones the next day's program each evening to a nearly empty chamber. His official biography in the Congressional Directory boasts that he has "held more legislative elective offices than has any other individual in the history of West Virginia," and that he "carried all 55 counties in 1970 general election for the first time in the state's history and received highest percentage of votes (78) ever received by a candidate in a West Virginia statewide contested general election."

Still others say—without wanting to be quoted—that there is something too nakedly ambitious about favors he does for other senators: offering them a spare set of basketball tickets for the Bullets; giving them campaign funds allotted to him that he does not need; making campaign speeches for them; giving newly elected senators his own informed "crum course" in the ins and outs of the Senate, as he has been doing the past few weeks.

What accounts for the turn around rise of this enigmatic 57-year-old, who bucked Mine Workers' czar John L. Lewis to get his first Senate nomination, who won early public office by playing a mean country fiddle at every rally, who still plays it for his grandchildren, and who sometimes holds a bluegrass jam session in his stately Senate office with country guitarist Sen. James Abourezk (D-S.D.)?

Byrd-watchers attribute his success to: The poor boy's enormous ambition, fostered by his early poverty as a coal miner's stepchild, as a butcher-boy in depression West Virginia, as a welder in Baltimore and Tampa shipyards in World War II.

A finer and subtler mind than he gets credit for—a mind that enabled him to learn welding from a book for that Baltimore job; that earned him a law degree, cum laude, from American University in 1963 while a member of Congress, although he had never finished college; that enabled him to trap FBI acting director L. Patrick Gray in a Senate Watergate hearing and to make Nelson A. Rockefeller squirm at his vice presidential nomination hearings last month.

Realization that his voting record is more moderate than many supposed, and that he has been moving closer to the liberal wing of his party in recent years.

His conservative image has developed because, even though he did not sign the Southern manifesto that condemned the Supreme Court's 1954 decision, Byrd has consistently voted against civil rights legislation (the 1964 Omnibus Law, the 1965 and 1970 Voting Rights acts). In favor of sharp limits on busing, in favor of the Carswell and Haynsworth Supreme Court nominations by President Nixon, and has condemned the court for decisions stretching defendants' legal rights. He also backed Nixon on Vietnam until almost the very end, condemned welfare "cheaters," and social "permissive" legislation.

His membership in the Klu Klux Klan in 1942-43, when he signed up 150 persons and was named Kleagle (organizer), hurts his image. He concedes it was a "mistake" points out the "back in that time and in that part of the country, a lot of people, respectable people, were members."

But he has always had a good labor record (the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education rates him 81 votes right, 44 votes wrong since he came to the Senate; the UMW rates him 11 out of 11 so far this year).

backed the liberal position on bread-and-butter issues like housing, Social Security, jobless benefits, federal projects. His "conservative coalition" support in 1959 was only 35 per cent and in the last two Congresses, about 50-50.

Recently, he has been talking and voting liberal on some showcase issues—against Richard Kleindienst nomination for Attorney General, against the Peter Flanigan nomination for ambassador, outstandingly vocal against the Nixon pardon and President Ford's "do-nothing" economic policies. And he has cooperated with liberals on issues like postcard voter registration and rounded up votes for consumer protection legislation.

But some northerners say privately that Byrd's recent liberal votes are merely aimed at improving his image for a future leadership race.

The ability to play "hard ball" when he feels he must, Lyndon B. Johnson (D-Tex.), then majority leader, put him on the Appropriations Committee when he came to the Senate, and he proudly relates how he blocked White House projects in every administration to bargain for West Virginia projects;

"When they decided to shut down the National Training School for Boys in the District, through my Appropriations spot I was able to block something President Kennedy wanted. One day he called me and said, 'Bob, if you will remove that block I'll locate the NTS wherever you want.' It ended at Morgantown."

Above all other factors is Byrd's fantastic energy, mastery of details, willingness to work at routine and vexing chores hour after hour, be on the Senate floor for a dozen hours at a time month after month, barely pausing to go to the bathroom, and to perform all the annoying and exhausting functions that go with "managing" the Senate.

At every moment, someone in or close to the leadership must be on hand on the floor to schedule bills, to call up nominations, to make sure that something a senator wants held up is not passed inadvertently, to reach agreements with the other side on time for debate—in short, make sure that business goes smoothly.

Byrd's willingness to do this tiring dirty work is what earned him the whip job. His rise began with his 1967 election as Democratic Party secretary, a tiny foothold in the leadership.

Ted Kennedy, elected whip in 1969, did not view the job as requiring him to attend primarily to the floor needs of senators, and he spent relatively little time there. Then came Chappaquiddick and his father's illness, and he was away for long periods.

The whip work simply was not done. Byrd began helping Mansfield on the floor, staying late to watch things when some windy orator insisted on reading a long speech into the record after everyone else had left, coming in early to "open the Senate" when Mansfield couldn't.

He was given more and more responsibility by the grateful Mansfield until, in fact if not title, he was performing the whip function. Quietly, in the winter of 1970, he lined up votes, and in January, 1971, he took away Kennedy's title.

"I must say, he's been damned effective," said Edmund Muskie (D-Maine). "In any organization—a social club, the Boy Scouts or the Senate—when a guy is ready to go out and do the dirty work, the legwork, it's a good case for advancement. He wheels and deals for us. He's a service organization all by himself and a very efficient one."

Muskie told this story about Byrd's industry: "I remember when he first handled the D.C. appropriations bill—as floor manager. His first presentation. I was sitting in the chair presiding. He had the whole thing memorized! He didn't look at a note. It was an amazing performance. It wasn't blind memorization. He had thoroughly mastered it. That's power. When anyone does that kind of a job, it's convertible to power. Respect and leadership comes whenever a member of a group comes forward and does something and does it well."

Another example, known to this reporter: Byrd clearly envisioned himself early this year as the potential star performer at a Senate impeachment trial of President Nixon.

Possibly alone among senators, he had read almost every available document on Watergate—the Nixon tapes, the hearings, plus most of the Senate impeachment trial proceedings of the past.

Industry and application have characterized Byrd's life. Brought up in a very poor family by an aunt and her coal miner husband after his mother died in a flu epidemic, he gathered neighborhood garbage after school to feed the hogs.

Graduating from high school in 1934 with excellent grades, he had no chance at college because of the depression, but managed to find jobs as gas pump jockey, produce salesman and butcher. Teaching Sunday school, he enrolled 600 in his class.

After the shipyard interlude during World War II, he returned as head butcher, filed for the state legislature in 1946 and won with the help of his fiddle. While he served, his wife Erma Ora ran a grocery store to help make ends meet, and he simultaneously went to college at night and rolled up 70 hours of straight "A" credits (he never finished but went to law school later at American University).

After six years in the legislature, he ran for the U.S. House in 1952 and won, although his former Klan connection almost cost him the race.

In 1958, he won the Senate nomination, despite an effort by John L. Lewis to keep him in the House so a Lewis favorite could run.

He relaxes in his office or home with a cigar or his fiddle—he plays a lot for his grandchildren (he has two daughters and six grandchildren)—but otherwise has few pastimes. Mostly he works.

The power Byrd now wields, and may eventually wield as majority leader, should not be overestimated, however. "Titles up here enormously exceed the real power grant," said Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.). "I don't think any leader's got a lot of power," said Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), "not like the days of Russell and Johnson."

Nelson and Byrd himself point out that Johnson operated with the backing of a big Southern Democratic group that had most of the committee chairmanships and that drawing unity from the common fight against civil rights legislation, often acted as a bloc. That group has eroded. In the current Congress, Northern Democrats outnumber Southern, 42 to 16; Northerners will be even more dominant next year.

In Johnson's day, the leader, in effect, controlled the precious appointments to the best committees; Mansfield has replaced that with secret-ballot voting by a 19-member, geographically and ideologically balanced steering committee.

A leader's strength today comes from his personal prestige, his fairness, his willingness to work hard and make himself knowledgeable, a shrewd ability to work out compromises, the little favors he can do members in scheduling legislation and minding the floor. On a vote, he can ask senators who don't have a really strong conviction to go along. Therein lies his power, if he chooses to exert it.

Mansfield, whose personal prestige is unequalled, does not bear down very hard, rarely asking for votes on anything, although he has a curious way of sliding things into place in the direction he wants them to go.

Within the policy limits set by Mansfield, Byrd plays much harder ball. But Byrd also helps chairmen round up votes, in a way Mansfield rarely does. And he performs personal favors.

Byrd, this fall, made election speeches—playing his fiddle, too—for Alan Cranston (Calif.), Mike Gravel (Alaska), James B. Allen (Ala.), Robert Morgan, who won a vacant seat in North Carolina, and several others including Harold Ford, a black House candidate in Tennessee.

Byrd is so good at his job that he could resist any challenge to his status as whip. But majority leader is a different story. Byrd is to the right of the majority of the Senate Democrats, and many liberals privately say they just don't want him as the national spokesman and a majority policy influence in the Senate.

A number of potential challengers have been mentioned for Mansfield's post (his Senate term is up in 1976 but he may run again). No one has declared, even privately, but the leading liberal possibilities are considered to be Muskie, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) and, as outside possibilities, Kennedy and Cranston. One Southerner, Ernest F. Hollings (S.C.), is also sometimes mentioned.

Byrd, however, is the heavy early favorite. As one liberal puts it, "given the osmosis of this place, it'll probably be Byrd."

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD VETO CARGO PREFERENCE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the President now has before him the Cargo Preference bill. It should be vetoed.

It is opposed by every department and agency of the Government that has expressed a view on it. Economists, newspapers, and citizens all have urged that this legislation never become law.

Yesterday, the representatives of 10 nations led by Great Britain, on the instructions of their governments, took the highly unusual step of going to the White House and urging the President not to allow this bill to become law.

The reasons why this bill should be vetoed are legion. It barely passed the Senate by four votes, even though five Senators who were opposed to the bill were present on the floor, and withheld their votes.

The maritime lobby is a strong one. We all know that. With the end of a Congress, the power of the pressure groups becomes greater, and they have had their say this week. However, the American people, the people who are going to have to pay the incredibly inflationary costs of this bill, the nations of the world with whom we have treaties which this bill would violate, they must now be heard by the White House. The President has asked the Congress to act responsibly to curb inflation. Many of us have taken his request most seriously, especially with regard to this legislation which the President has acknowledged to be highly inflationary. In that same spirit, 26 Senators have signed a letter to the President urging him to veto this very bad piece of legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE.
Washington, D.C., December 18, 1974.
The President.
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You now have before you the so-called "Energy Transportation Security Act." We strongly urge you to veto this bill.

Every Executive department which expressed an opinion on this legislation opposed it. These include the Departments of State, Defense, Treasury, Commerce, Interior, and Agriculture, as well as the General Services Administration, the Federal Energy Office, the Office of Management and Budget, the Federal Trade Commission, the Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs, and the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors. Economists, newspapers and citizens of every political philosophy oppose this legislation. In your message to the Congress on November 18 you noted the "problems which this bill raises in the areas of foreign relations, national security, and, perhaps most significantly, the potential inflationary impact of cargo preference."

The record is clear. You have asked the Congress to act responsibly, and now the people of this nation can look only to you to prevent this bill from becoming law. We respectfully request that you veto this highly inflationary, highly unwise legislation. Considering the 46 Senators who either voted against the bill, or indicated their opposition to it on December 16, we can pledge to you that the Senate will sustain your veto.

Sincerely,

CONGRESS ACTS TO EXTEND AND ENFORCE THE 55-MILE-PER-HOUR SPEED LIMIT

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate for its action in passing the conference report on S. 3934, the Federal Aid Highway Amendments of 1974. I am especially grateful to the distinguished chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works, Senators RANDOLPH and BAKER, and to the distinguished chairman and the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Roads, Senators BENTSEN and STAFFORD, for their steadfast support for the 55 miles per hour speed limit.

I am extremely proud to have been associated with this legislation as the sponsor of provisions to extend indefinitely and fully enforce the 55 miles per hour speed limit, which has already saved over 10,000 human lives and over 50 million barrels of oil this year. In completing action on the conference report on S. 3934, the Congress has acted both to extend and enforce the reduced speed limit, which has had so dramatic an impact on safety and fuel conservation on our Nation's highways.

It can be said that the 55 miles per hour speed limit is one of the few good things to come out of last winter's energy crunch. It is the silver lining of an otherwise very dismal cloud. The speed limit has provided a painless and unexpected method of reversing the inexorable annual increases in traffic fatalities and gasoline consumption.

For the record, I would like to describe again the highly salutary effect which the 55 miles per hour speed limit has had this year in saving American lives. Compared with the same period in 1973, traffic fatalities in the first 10 months of this year declined by 9,350 persons, or 20 percent, according to the National Safety Council. This reduction represents a fatality rate of 3.5 per 100 million vehicle miles traveled during January through October 1974, compared with 4.27 fatalities per 100 million vehicle miles for the first 10 months of 1973.

According to the Department of Transportation, this will be the lowest traffic fatality rate in U.S. history, in terms of vehicle miles traveled.

I ask unanimous consent that the month-by-month lifesaving figures for 1974, compiled by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Congress has done a great service to the people of the United States by continuing in law this extraordinary life- and energy-saving statute, and by providing a mechanism for adequate enforcement. President Ford has advocated the extension and strict enforcement of the 55 miles per hour speed limit. I now urge him to uphold that position by signing S. 3934 into law.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S CHRISTMAS PACKAGE

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, how ironic it is that President Ford should unveil his latest plan to cut Federal expenditures during this Christmas season. His present to the Nation's elderly poor is a one-two economic punch that promises to create unconscionable financial burdens on those least capable of sustaining them.

It is incomprehensible to me that men of supposed intelligence, judgment, and good will could have conceived such an insensitive and inhumane program. During a period of dire economic crisis which registers its greatest impact on those with fixed incomes and limited or non-existent earning power, our Government should be providing additional assistance to senior citizens, not slashing what little they already have. We need legislation that will assist the elderly to assure themselves of adequate fuel for heating and cooking; instead, the President has proposed to deprive them of access to food stamps which provide a small subsidy but one that in many cases spells the difference between an adequate diet and malnutrition.

Why is the administration heaping such hardship on the most vulnerable of our citizenry? For what crime is this retribution? The crime of becoming aged? Or is it the less obvious crime of being comparatively weak politically?

In the abstract, the objective of the administration does not seem too offensive. On the one hand, they are trying to cut unnecessary Federal expenditures which fuel inflation, and, on the other, they are, in the food stamp program, attempting to equalize the proportion of income devoted to food. They espouse the view that, at a minimum, individuals ought to pay 30 percent of their income for food. If an individual's income stands at $150 a month—and I assure the Senate that hundreds of thousands of Americans live at this level—he is effectively barred from food purchase assistance. A couple whose joint income is $225 a month—and, again, Mr. President, far too many Americans survive on this amount—paid out $66 a month for food stamps which provided them with approximately $92 a month worth of food; under the Ford plan, they would be required to pay $67.50 for those same stamps. That is an increase of almost 21 percent.

The administration is not content to create a plan that will affect the ability of senior citizens to eat healthful meals. They simultaneously propose to substantially decrease their access to medical treatment. Under present law, the elderly are required to pay a deductible of $92 toward their first 60 days of hospitalization. The Ford administration would raise this to $750—an increase of 700 percent. Officials estimate that this would generate a savings of about $425 million over a one-half year period. I would ask those same officials what the cost of this savings is in terms of human suffering? The injustice of the program is so painfully evident that criticism seems almost gratuitous. Yet, we must take this to be the considered view of the Ford administration, and one of its major inflation-fighting tactics. It cannot, therefore, be ignored no matter how apparently ill-considered. It is a program that is perfectly congruent with the deliberate, methodical attempt on the part of the Nixon administration to dismantle the major pieces of social legislation enacted during the Johnson years. The scepter has now passed to President Ford.

The administration's two-pronged attack on the elderly can and must be resisted by Congress. I propose two countermeasures. First, the increase in the medicare deductible cannot be accomplished by executive fiat; it needs congressional approval. We must not yield, regardless of how great the pressures or how well-orchestrated the campaign.

Second, the Department of Agriculture has the authority to change the Food Stamp Act of 1964 to accomplish its goals. Congress, however, can pass legislation at the outset of the new session to freeze the program until the impact of the proposed changes can be examined and alternatives analyzed. We need not sit idly by while the minimum standards of equity and justice established by this body are cavalierly tossed aside.

The Congress has been too lackadaisical in the face of executive encroachment. The line that is so clearly drawn in the Constitution must be reaffirmed. Our intent was to protect the most vulnerable of our citizens from hunger and malnutrition, and to provide them with adequate medical care. We must not allow a callous administration to deprive the elderly poor of the essentials of a decent life.

THE FORD-GISCARD MEETING

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, the Philadelphia Inquirer on Wednesday published an excellent editorial on the Ford-Giscard meeting in Martinique. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORD, GISCARD ACHIEVE A HOPEFUL "SYNTHESIS"

The three-day Martinique meeting of President Ford and French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing seems to have achieved a nice "synthesis," as Secretary of State Henry Kissinger put it "of the French and American positions" on how to deal with the oil cartel.

That is one of the purposes of diplomacy, the bringing together of divergent positions between nations which share common interests. In this case, the common interest is to find ways by which the U.S., France and other oil-consuming countries can stop being at the mercy of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which has jacked up prices over 400 percent over the past year.

And while the two presidents were conferring on Martinique, OPEC was holding its own meeting in Vienna, where it announced still another price increase, about 38 cents a barrel over last September's level, while generously declaring that it would hold the new level for the next nine months.

The "synthesis" is in part on tactics. The French, fearful of provoking the Arab countries, upon which they are so dependent for so much of their oil, had been insisting on a conference of producers together with consumers. The U.S., which can manage without foreign oil in a crunch, has sought a united front of consuming countries first.

In their meeting, Mr. Ford and M. Giscard arrived at a compromise—a preliminary consumer-producer meeting first, to be followed by "intensive consultations" among consumer countries to prepare for a subsequent consumer-producer conference probably next fall.

So much for the tactics, but something else occurred in the warm atmosphere of the French island, and that was a warm atmosphere between the leaders of countries which, though allies, have long been at loggerheads.

In addition to other agreements, they disposed of the long-standing irritant which began in 1967, when former French President Charles de Gaulle pulled French forces out of the military network of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. That had to do with a financial settlement by the French for U.S. military bases in France. The two leaders compromised on $100 million, one-fourth the U.S. asking price, nearly four times the last French offer.

For the new spirit of cooperation between the two ancient allies, our compliments to M. Giscard, who began a thaw in U.S.-French relations when he came to power last May, and to Mr. Ford, who has run into criticism for his trips abroad. Certainly this trip was worth the going.

FEDERAL REVENUE SHARING

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I am a firm believer in the concept of revenue sharing. Such grants enable the Federal Government to be of assistance in many areas, and at the same time preserve the decisionmaking process at the local level. As a result, citizens are more aware of where and why their money is being spent, and the fiscal process encourages participation at a grassroots level.

For that reason, I have joined in co-sponsoring legislation which will extend Federal revenue sharing for another 7 years. Although the current revenue sharing plan does not expire until 1976, many States are already in the process of planning budgets for our Nation's bicentennial year, and need to know what funds will be available. By acting now, we will allow local and State officials to plan future budgets with the certainty that the Federal program will continue.

Recently, local officials in several Maryland jurisdictions forwarded to me resolutions in support of the general revenue sharing program. These resolutions point up very clearly the positive aspects of this important program, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD, for the benefit of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[County Commissioners of Charles County, Md.]

RESOLUTION No. 74-45

Whereas, Charles County, Maryland has been annually receiving $1,151,837.00 dollars of vitally needed fiscal assistance through the general revenue sharing program; and

Whereas, these funds are received directly from the federal government with a minimum of restrictions and red tape which enables Charles County, Maryland to use the money for locally determined, priority needs; and

Whereas, Charles County, Maryland has spent its entitlements under the revenue sharing program as follows:

Purchase of ambulance	$12,807
Purchase for sheriff's cars	170,576
Deputy salaries	269,795
Library funding	2,500
Purchase of new accounting system for county	50,000
Construction of playgrounds	12,275
Pitch In Campaign	12,865
and fiscal year budgets for:
grading and sediment control	$10,000
Sheriff's department	890,337
Animal shelter	50,000
Communications	50,000
Waste Disposal	50,000

Drug abuse	$13,000
Mental health	40,000
Hospital	8,500
Libraries	100,000
Parks and recreation	100,000

Whereas, despite general revenue sharing, the current rate of inflation is also undermining the ability of the County government to provide essential services within a reasonable and acceptable level of taxation; and

Whereas, the general revenue sharing program, approved by Congress in 1973, will terminate at the end of 1976 unless the program is continued by the 94th Congress; and

Whereas, the termination of the general revenue sharing program will force Charles County, Maryland to either curtail essential services or raise the tax rate by 10.7 percent. Now, therefore, be it resolved, That the citizens of Charles County, speaking through their elected representatives on the Board of County Commissioners, unanimously endorse the continuation of the general revenue sharing program and call on the 94th Congress to re-enact the program during its first session in order to insure that vitally needed federal assistance will be provided to the citizens of Charles County.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the following members of the Senate and the House of Representatives: Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., J. Glenn Beall, Jr. and Robert E. Bauman and that a public written response be immediately requested which clearly states the candidates support or opposition to the re-enactment for the general revenue sharing program by the 94th Congress.

RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF CONTINUATION OF GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

Whereas, the City of Frederick has or will receive $1,854,919.00 of vitally needed fiscal assistance through the allocation of federal dollars under the General Revenue Sharing program; and

Whereas, These Revenue Sharing dollars are received directly from the federal government with a minimum of federal bureaucratic red tape which enables the city of Frederick to use their revenue sharing funds to meet the locally determined priority needs of the community; and

Whereas, the citizens of Frederick view their locally elected officials as being accountable for the expenditure of revenue sharing dollars, and that such clearly defined accountability has resulted in increased citizen involvement in identifying the priority needs of the community; and

Whereas, the City of Frederick has appropriated $1,854,919.00 of revenue sharing funds that have been or will be received. (A copy of these appropriations is attached hereto.)

Whereas, the citizens of Frederick are being severely affected by the spiraling and unprecedented rate of inflation which is stripping them of their hard-earned income; and

Whereas, the current inflationary rate of 12% is also undermining the ability of city hall to provide essential services to the community within reasonable and acceptable levels of local taxation; and

Whereas, the General Revenue Sharing Program is providing essential fiscal relief to the devastating impact of inflation; and

Whereas, the General Revenue Sharing Program, which began in 1972, will terminate in 1976 unless the 94th Congress, which is being elected this November and will convene in January 1975, authorizes an extension of the General Revenue Sharing Program; and

Whereas, the termination of the General Revenue Sharing Program will place the city of Frederick in the untenable position of either having to decrease essential community services by 9.97% or raise taxes by 21.49%;

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the city of Frederick, speaking through its locally elected council and mayor, unanimously endorses the continuation of the General Revenue Sharing program and calls upon the 94th Congress to re-enact the General Revenue Sharing program in order to insure that vitally needed federal assistance will be provided to the City of Frederick.

Be it further resolved, That the representatives of the U.S. House of Representatives from the 6th District and the representatives of the U.S. Senate from the State of Maryland, be requested to publicly state their support for the re-enactment of the General Revenue Sharing Program in order for the citizens of Frederick to be informed of their commitment, or lack thereof, to this essential federal assistance program.

And be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the following: Congressman Goodloe E. Byron, Senator J. Glenn Beall, Jr., Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Congressional Candidate Elton R. Wampler, and Senatorial Candidate Barbara Mikulski.

and that a public written response be immediately requested from each representative which clearly states his position on the continuation of the general revenuesharing program.

[Frederick County Council of Governments]
RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF CONTINUATION OF GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

Whereas, the members of the Frederick County Council of Governments have received substantial amounts of vitally needed fiscal assistance through the allocation of federal dollars under the General Revenue Sharing program; and

Whereas, these Revenue Sharing dollars are received directly from the federal government with a minimum of federal bureaucratic red tape which enables Frederick County and its municipal corporations to use their revenue sharing funds to meet the locally determined priority needs of the community; and

Whereas, Frederick County and its municipal corporations have used Revenue Sharing funds for a variety of improvements and community services; and

Whereas, the termination of General Revenue Sharing will place Frederick County and its municipal corporations in an unfavorable financial position.

Now, therefore, be it resolved That the Council of Governments of Frederick County unanimously endorses the continuation of General Revenue Sharing program and calls upon the Congress to re-enact the program in order to insure vitally needed federal assistance.

Whereas, Harford County has been annually receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars of vitally needed fiscal assistance through the general revenue sharing program; and

Whereas, these funds are received directly from the federal government with a minimum of restrictions and redtape which enables Harford County to use the money for locally determined, priority needs; and

Whereas, despite general revenue sharing, the current rate of inflation is also undermining the ability of the county government to provide essential services within a reasonable and acceptable level of taxation; and

Whereas, the general revenue sharing program, approved by Congress in 1973, will terminate at the end of 1978 unless the program is continued by the 94th Congress; and revenue sharing program will force Harford County to either curtail essential services or greatly increase the tax rate;

Now, therefore, be it resolved, That the citizens of Harford County, speaking through their elected representatives on the County Council, unanimously endorse the continuation of the general revenue sharing program and call on the 94th Congress to re-enact the program during its first session in order to insure that vitally needed federal assistance will be provided to the citizens of Harford County.

And be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately forwarded to our elected officials and candidates for the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives, and that a public written response be immediately requested which clearly states the candidates' support or opposition to the re-enactment for the general revenue sharing program by the 94th Congress.

JOHN H. O'NEILL,
President, Harford County Council.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF THURMONT, Md.,
November 18, 1974.

Re: Revenue Sharing Funds.

HON. J. GLENN BEALL,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BEALL: It is our understanding that the Administration proposes a balanced budget, and in order to do this, several projects must be omitted. We understand that the Revenue Sharing Fund Program is one of the projects.

We, as the Commissioners of Thurmont, urge that you use your influence to continue this Program. The Town of Thurmont, to date, has received $85,583 of Revenue Sharing Funds. These funds have helped to keep the tax rate at a minimum, which is 75¢ per $100 assessed valuation. Also, due to the receipt of these funds, we have been able to complete several capital improvement programs that were urgently needed in the Town of Thurmont.

Please find enclosed, a summary of the funds received and how they were used by the Town of Thurmont.

Again, we are urging you to use your influence in helping to continue the Revenue Sharing Fund Program, as it is much needed by all communities.

Very truly yours,

JAMES F. BLACK,
President of the Board.

Capital improvement programs financed by the revenue sharing allocations

North Carroll Street: Street improvements, blacktop street, curb, gutter and sidewalk; replace water and sanitary sewer lines	$35,990.21
North Carroll Street and Apples Church Road: blacktop street, storm drainage	3,503.03
Purchase of a Cues truck and television equipment to view and repair the sanitary sewer mains	28,610.00
Moser Road: storm sewer installation, from Frederick Road to Sewer Plant Road	17,480.00

NOTE: The above funds is only Revenue Sharing Funds applied to the projects, Town funds from Tax Revenues was also appropriated to the projects.

THE WORLD BANK

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., Mr. President, Robert S. McNamara, President of the World Bank, said in an interview yesterday that he was "euphoric" about the $750 million loan from Saudi Arabia to the World Bank. Mr. McNamara says it not only means a big addition to the Bank's lending resources but also helps to recycle money from the Arab countries to investment in the less developed part of the world.

The loan from Saudi Arabia will extend for 10 years and will bear an interest rate of 8½ percent.

This brings to mind the recent action of the Congress of the United States in agreeing to contribute an additional $1½ billion to the International Development Association, the soft loan window of the World Bank. The United States must go into the money market and borrow that money at an interest rate of between 8 and 9 percent, then turn it over to the World Bank as a contribution. Of course, the United States loses both the interest and the amount of the contribution.

So, the same year that the United States is contributing an additional—an additional—$1½ billion to the World Bank, oil-rich, dollar-rich Saudi Arabia is loaning—loaning—$750 million to the World Bank at an interest rate of 8½ percent.

Mr. McNamara may be "euphoric" about the Saudi Arabian loan, but the senior Senator from Virginia would be "euphoric" if the Congress and the administration would cease giving away tax funds to the World Bank while other countries are making loans to that international organization at high interest rates.

FAIR TRADE LEGISLATION

Mr. BROOKE, Mr. President, on December 3, 1974, I introduced S. 4203, a bill to repeal exemptions in the antitrust laws relating to fair trade laws. I listed a number of examples at that time of the excessive prices paid by consumers in fair trade States compared to nonfair trade State prices. I also stated that State fair trade laws cost the American consumer more than $2 billion in higher prices every year.

I was particularly interested to read in this morning's Washington Post a news article entitled, "Virginians Pay Premium Because of Fair Trade Act." The article points out in specific detail the extra cost burden placed on consumers in this area and will be, I am certain, a revelation to many of us.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 19, 1974]

Christmas shoppers in Virginia are paying a questionable premium of about 20 per cent for some of their purchases because of the state's Fair Trade Act. Numerous manufacturers and small retailers wouldn't have it any other way.

Critics of the act label it blatant price-fixing, and say it is siphoning off hundreds of thousands of dollars from Virginia consumers already hardpinched by inflation.

Supporters insist that "fair trade" is not anticonsumer—that is pro-small business. Without it, they maintain, many service-oriented "Mom and Pop" retailers would be forced out of business by large-volume discount chains.

Whatever the viewpoint, the facts are indisputable that the real loser in terms of dollars is the consumer.

As far back as 1969, the Council of Economic Advisers estimated that the annual cost to consumers in states having fair trade laws was $1.5 billion.

Customers of Best Products Co., Inc., a Richmond-based catalogue merchandising firm vigorously opposed to fair trade laws, are paying $569.95 this year for a 19-inch Sony color television set.

In states where there is unlimited price competition, Best sells the same set for $499.97—or nearly $70 less. There are comparable differences in the prices of other products.

Particularly dramatic is the impact of fair trade laws on the retail costs of common nonprescription drugs.

While the figures are old, the price spread testified to before Congress a number of years ago for some of these items remains the same.

The cold remedy Coricidin could be bought in the District of Columbia for 51 cents, whereas sniffers in the fair trade state of Maryland had to pay $1.08. Bayer aspirin cost 99 cents in the District and $1.48 in nearby Bethesda. The price differential for insulin used by diabetics was the same.

Increased consumer concern over inflation has spurred renewed interest at both state and federal levels in repealing fair trade laws.

U.S. Attorney General William Saxbe recently urged Congress to scrap the federal legislation that permits states to enforce such laws.

And Del. Warren Stambaugh (D-Arlington) thinks chances are good for getting his carry-over repeal bill onto the House floor for a vote in the 1975 General Assembly.

Stambaugh, chairman of a Northern Virginia consumer protection group, said, "The more we looked into the Fair Trade Act, the more we became convinced that it was pure price-fixing."

The office of Attorney General Andrew P. Miller has taken the official position that "there is no valid reason for continuing to impose the economic cost upon consumers in Virginia that is occasioned by price-fixing in the form of resale price maintenance."

If legal officials, consumers and many large retailers favor abolishing the fair trade laws, who supports them?

In some instances, it's manufacturers who feel that the prestige of their name would be tarnished if their products were subjected to price competition.

But most of the hands-off attitude comes from small retailers and the trade associations that represent them.

Price maintenance began in the wholesale drug industry in 1878 and had spread to the retail level in 46 states by the late 1940s.

The initial impetus was provided by retail druggists. Small hardware and appliance dealers subsequently joined the movement.

Because of adverse court rulings, many states have abandoned fair trade in recent years and fewer than half of them have such laws on the books today.

The case for fair trade was summed up at a legislative hearing in Richmond two years ago.

Eugene B. Sydnor Jr., a former president of the Virginia Retail Merchants Association, told the hearing that "fair trade" was the only way to assure the independent retailer a reasonable profit margin.

Without fair trade, he said, the small merchants "risks the possibility that a nationally advertised item will be sold by certain competitors at loss leader prices."

In short, fair trade does no more than place the independent retailer on the same footing as the national chain...

Sydnor said when this occurs, the independent retailer "cannot hope to make up the lost profits through large volume sales or through sales of other higher items which subsidize the discounted article."

Assistant Attorney General Walter Marston argued at the same hearing that the "loss-leader" argument is nothing more than a smokescreen to diffuse what essentially is a drive to eliminate price competition.

Ironically, Marston said, fair trade laws spurred large chains into promoting their own "house brands," forcing the small retailer to maintain a fair trade price on name brands while his competitor undersold him with private brands of comparable quality.

Marston also said that facts contradict the assertion that fair trade preserves competition.

"The rate of business failure is consistently higher in states having resale price maintenance laws than in those states permitting price competition," he said.

Sumpter Priddy, executive director of the Virginia Retail Merchants Association, said his group will continue to oppose fair trade repeal in the 1975 legislature.

"It does very little to hurt anybody since the additional service offered by independent retailers tends to cancel out the price savings in discount merchandising," Priddy said.

Critics disagree, claiming that manufacturer warranties protect the consumer, and that even discount retailers today offer a level of service nearly comparable to that of the small merchandiser.

Marston insisted that the effect on consumers should be the ultimate test of the effect of fair trade laws, especially in a time of rampant inflation.

He pointed to studies showing that consumers in fair trade states pay from 19 percent to 27 percent higher prices than consumers in states without such laws.

Soon after the Ohio Supreme Court ruled against a key clause in that state's Fair Trade Act, Marston noted, the price on automatic coffeemakers dropped from $39.95 to $29.87.

Although its recommendation was not adopted, a subcommittee of the Virginia Advisory Legislative Council earlier this year urged that the Virginia Fair Trade Act be repealed.

It did so, it said, "because the weight of evidence on the subject strongly suggested that a fair trade scheme resulted in higher prices at the consumer level without any discernible beneficial effects for the business-man."

SENATOR MATHIAS ON LIBERTY IN A HOSTILE WORLD

Mr. HART, Mr. President, today, more than ever, there is a need for those of us charged with the responsibility for governing these United States to weigh the longer range impact of our decisions. The choices we make today, choices which will affect the basic direction which our economy and our society will take, will leave us scant margin for error. Mankind is at the turning point, as the title of the Second Report to the Club of Rome notes, and it is important that we consider all of the ramifications of all of the decisions we make. It is also important that we face all of the dangers that lie before us.

My colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland, has, I believe, made a worthy contribution to the necessary dialog in remarks he prepared on the occasion of his very deserved receipt of the Henry W. Edgerton Civil Liberties Award for 1974 from the Washington Chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union. Senator MATHIAS chose that occasion to remark on the danger to civil liberties that upheavals such as those we are now facing can cause. It is a warning that we all must heed as we enter this uncertain future.

I ask unanimous consent that the complete version of Senator MATHIAS' remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BEFORE THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

(By Senator CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR.)

I am particularly pleased to be here and am extremely proud of the honor that you do me. I feel at home among friends. There is a kind of kinship among us which comes from sharing the burden of working together on so many issues.

In just this past year, we have seen the repeal of no-knock. We have seen both Houses of Congress pass comprehensive privacy legislation. We can anticipate the success of legislation guaranteeing the right to a speedy trial. We have seen the enactment of legislation strengthening the Freedom of Information Act. And we have seen Watergate—a stain on our history—spawned in disregard of civil liberties—but an event which demonstrated the underlying commitment of many citizens to the Constitution.

This was a year of positive progress—but there is much left to be done. So let us tonight discuss some of the challenges to civil liberties we might anticipate confronting in coming years.

For example, there is the remaining problem of warrantless wire-taps, as the most flagrant invasion of privacy. I have sponsored legislation designed to curb this abuse. It should be acted upon with dispatch by the Congress.

There is the regulation of the use of criminal justice information. This has been a concern of mine for several years, as I know that it has been a concern of yours. Indeed, what we seek is a legislative guarantee of the results of the Meard decision. A decision in which you played a prominent role.

We have a broad group of supporters for this legislation in the Senate. We have drafted this legislation to provide shared Federal-State responsibility through a board to regulate such information. This is indeed the new federalism at work. I regret, therefore, that attempts to draft final legislation in cooperation with the Department of Justice have failed to yield results. The time has come to break this logjam. Either the Department of Justice or the White House and the President's Privacy Committee must do so.

The new 94th Congress will also be dealing seriously with proposed reforms of the criminal code. This revision raises numerous civil liberties problems which will be of concern to both you and I. I would hope that the congressional program in the area of civil liberties in the next two years would also include guidelines for the operation of the FBI, a study of the intelligence community including the CIA, curbs on surveillance of citizens by the military and executive branch agencies, attention to the problems of privacy from state and local government and private groups, and amendments to the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

We must also respond to the Supreme Court's decision in the ACLU and California banker's challenge to the Bank Secrecy Act. The records of private citizens contained in bank statements, or telephone accounts, or similar third-party files, must be given protection equivalent to that secured by the Fourth Amendment. Legislation has been drafted—with your assistance—but we must increase our efforts to ensure its enactment. And, it goes without saying, that as we approach this legislative year, you can help greatly. We need your help and attention to legislation—we need on the Hill the skill that you have always demonstrated in the courtrooms of the United States.

But, I do not choose tonight to use this opportunity which you have given me to dwell solely on these issues. The dialogue I would begin here with you tonight will center not on the value of these liberties. I think we are agreed on their value. That is why we are here. My concern is their preservation, the preservation of liberty in a hostile world.

We Americans, I believe, take too much for granted the benign environment in which our political values, our political institutions and our civil liberties have developed. The yield of a garden is dependent upon the state of the soil and the care which it received. And civil liberties grow best in a well-cared for garden.

The American garden, I believe we would all agree, has been a rich one. An open continent, abundant natural resources, upward mobility, an enormous capacity to absorb European immigration and westward migration. And in this atmosphere we were able to develop a society with a sense of concern for the rights of man, a society where the ideas of Locke and other European thinkers were felt to apply to the common man.

This abundant American garden was not so much well-tended as it was capable of growing without much attention. But times have changed.

It is difficult to talk frankly about current developments without sounding overly pessimistic and I do not seek the role of Jeremiah. But I do think that we must face the fact that this Nation and the Western World are in for, at best, some severe dislocation in our way of life, if not the long-predicted decline of the West.

And, as the industrial nations such as the United States respond to this changed condition of the world, as the shortages in resources of the globe shrink in proportion to the demands of the globe, there will be a pulling and hauling on the institutions of society which I think will test to the ultimate the dedication of the American people and others to civil liberties.

Famine is the most frightening. Tonight over 400 million people in the non-Communist world—a number twice that of the entire population of the United States—are suffering from substantial malnutrition. Most of these are children, who will suffer permanent physical and mental damage even if they survive the coming months, will be physically and mentally impaired throughout their lives and therefore disadvantaged in seeking a decent way of life. No civil liberty is secure, in any country, when so much of the world cannot even find a bowl of rice.

The global energy shortage, which I hope everyone now agrees, is a real problem and not a mirage. The fact that one can buy as much gasoline at the pumps as one can afford proves not that there is no crisis—rather it shows that the crisis is even worse than imagined because we have no control over it. We are continuing to consume energy at a rate which will, in the near term bankrupt much of the Western World and, in the long term, leave us without petroleum—whether or not we have yet found a substitute—in fuel, in petrochemicals and materials, in fertilizers, jobs, livelihoods, family life, and political institutions are threatened by our continuing delay in meeting the energy challenge.

Compounding these pressures is population growth, stabilizing in the United States, but pressing ahead elsewhere in the world, consuming economic advances as soon as they are made. As the world conference on population growth and reasonable economic advance must go hand in hand.

Europe, once the center of the universe, now looks elsewhere for direction. We need all her ancient skill and diplomacy in preventing another explosion in the Mid-East, but she has no capacity to help in containing such an explosion.

Meanwhile, government demonstrates its lack of ability to respond to these crises. People are apathetic, I saw this in the recent campaign. They seem to have give-up on government's ability to solve these problems. Ultimately their demands that it do so will diminish—generating less pressure for action.

So government has not found the answer to the petro-dollar crisis which threatens the world economic system. The Arab nations have roughly $60 billion a year which they must invest somewhere, for their sake and for ours. $60 billion is enough, by the way, to buy controlling interests in AT&T, General Motors, IBM, United States Steel, Boeing, Dow Chemical, General Dynamics, ITT, United Airlines, Xerox and Lockheed. You have heard that an attempt by one Arab nation to buy part of Lockheed was dealt with through an ad hoc arrangement. What other ad hoc arrangements may be in the works is unclear, but what is patent is the lack of any kind of process to protect the people most concerned.

Bureaucracy, at home and abroad, is not providing solutions. Our recent experience with wage-price controls showed us something about the difficulties of centrally administering a modern economy fairly and equitably. But it may not have shown us enough to prevent us from putting our head back in that ringer without safeguards to ensure due process and fair and open administration.

What does all of this mean? Its implications for civil liberties are not encouraging. As always, such concerns must compete for congressional attention with a host of other concerns and this problem is most severe in times like these, when the wolf is at the door.

But more ominously, the willingness of mankind to sacrifice civil liberties under pressure cannot be ignored. How many remember the statement "at least he made the trains run on time"? Can any of us hear that remark about Mussolini without a touch of fear. The young among us may get the same reaction when thinking back to the repressive reaction to the crime wave of the late sixties, a crime wave which the current economic slump threatens to revive. And there are always prophets who arise who have all sorts of simplistic and very wrong solutions to the complex problems of the world.

And so, I bring these problems to you. For several reasons. First, you have a direct interest. Liberty is your concern and so is anything which threatens it. It is people and groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union who will hew back to the bedrock principles of the American Constitution, in foul weather as well as fair. Second, you are the thoughtful leaders who can help find solutions to these problems of decreasing abundance.

I make this latter statement because I believe that the solutions are to be found in the processes and procedures which we establish. You know their importance. You know the meaning of the phrase "A government of laws, not of men." You have demonstrated that awareness at home, and together we are proceeding with our common agenda of safeguards and reforms.

That same awareness of the importance of process and procedures must be felt within the world community. We see today the emergence of a world unlike that of even two years ago. We confront challenges, as great, as sudden and as unexpected as those wrought by the devastation of the Second World War and the discovery of nuclear weapons.

As we did then, so must we now, recognize the necessity of shaping legal institutions and procedures for coping with these new realities.

The United Nations has played an enormously significant role during the past 29 years. But it must be strengthened, reshaped or supplemented if it is to keep pace with the challenges we confront.

Our international financial institutions are strained to the breaking point, and we must sculpt new financial arrangements which will not require the sacrifice of independence and liberty at the altar of energy and economic survival. These institutions must respond to the needs of both developed nations, such as Italy, and developing nations, whose prospects grow bleaker as each day passes.

Secretary Kissinger is carrying enormous burdens and responsibilities as he pursues his personal diplomacy. But as he himself recalls from the experience of Bismarck, world stability cannot be permitted to depend on the abilities of one man.

It is time to begin to weave the new fabric of international law which will guide nations toward a peaceful resolution of our disputes in the years ahead. Building this law—be it directed at international pipelines, or the law of the sea, or new monetary arrangements, or international tribunals and arbitration panels—and nurturing the notion that these laws exist to be used rather than ignored, that they are substance and not window dressing, is not an easy or short term proposition. But its difficulty makes it all the more important that we take the lead now.

INFLATION AND RECESSION

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, without question, the issue most on the minds of the American people today is the state of our economy. Faced with both rising prices and rising unemployment, the American people are growing more and more concerned about our Nation's economic future.

Our current economic difficulties are compounded by the fact that today's situation is somewhat different than anything we have ever experienced in the past. While we have known periods of recession and inflation throughout the economic history of the United States, this is the first time we have experienced an inordinately high rate of inflation at the same time as we have moved into a period of recession.

I might add that this problem is so unique that it is difficult to find unanimity of opinion as to its solution. While most people agree on the nature of the problem, there seems to be difficulty in reaching agreement on the programs that are best suited to bring us out of this troubling situation.

For instance, in an effort to gain as much insight into our economic situation and its potential solutions as possible, I contacted many prominent Marylanders, representing business, labor, and the academic communities, seeking their thoughts on this matter. Their answers were extremely well thought out. But those answers also showed the great variance in thought about what we should do to remedy our current difficulties.

It is obvious that our problems are complex and cannot be cured by simple solutions. However, I think it would be helpful to discuss briefly the nature of the problem and some steps I think government should and should not take in providing a remedy.

THE PROBLEM

First. The current nature of our problem: We face an inflation rate of almost 12 percent today, a rate higher than at any time since the Korean war.

There is a decline in the real gross national product for the third straight quarter.

We have a continuing decline in our industrial productivity. For instance, our third-quarter productivity declined 2.4 percent in the nonfarm sector and 0.2 percent in manufacturing, at seasonally adjusted annual rates. On the other hand, our unit labor costs rose at a 13.9 percent annual rate.

Consumer prices have continued to soar. Consumer prices in September rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 14.4 percent sparked by another big jump in food prices. In the last year, prices have risen over 12 percent, the biggest year-to-year advance since September of 1947.

Housing starts continue to slump. These starts are off nearly 40 percent from last year at this time. To make matters worse, the pace of new building permits, a very good indicator of future housing activities, is reported to be running at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of only 825,000 units, an 8½-year low.

But perhaps the most sobering statistic of all is that unemployment is at 6.5 percent and rising. This means that 5,975,000 people were unemployed in November.

The United States, of course, is not the only nation in the world affected by the troubling inflation and deepening recession. In all fairness, we should point out that the problem is international in character, thus the solution will, to some extent, result from multilateral action.

It should further be pointed out that the rate of inflation has been contributed to by special situations. The costs of food and oil, probably the two most important commodities in the world, have spiraled and of course these costs have dramatically shown up in our price cycle.

There are also world-wide shortages in other basic commodities. These shortages will continue, if for no other reason than that each year we add 80 million people to the world's population. Additionally, because the world's population is increasing in affluence, the competition to receive basic commodities and use our limited natural resources also increases. So, while some long-term solutions must be international in character, there are things we should and should not do here at home to alleviate our own domestic situation.

FISCAL POLICY

For many years, this Nation, and particularly the Congress, has shown a great deal of fiscal irresponsibility. We have continually run deficits in the Federal budget in times of economic prosperity which have contributed significantly to rising prices and tightening credit.

If our only problem was inflation, I believe we could handle the situation simply by balancing the Federal budget and adjusting the supply of money. But we face the equally damaging problem of recession. The classical solutions to inflation unfortunately, would have an adverse effect on the recessionary cycle, and so treating one problem while ignoring another would be pure folly.

I had hoped that we would be able to cut the Federal budget below $300 billion in fiscal 1975 and have a balanced budget in fiscal 1976. However, because of dwindling tax receipts caused by the recession, it unfortunately appears impossible to accomplish these goals.

However, we cannot forget the role the Federal budget plays in fanning the fires of inflation. Therefore, I believe it is absolutely essential that when we start to come out of our present economic decline, we begin to bring the Federal budget into balance so as to minimize inflationary pressures that will result from an unbalanced budget in a period of economic growth.

In the long run, we must move away from the mentality of permanent budget deficits, and stop funding programs far in excess of our ability to pay.

Monetary policy is by far the Government's most powerful weapon in fighting inflation. In part, our current inflationary spiral has been caused by a too rapid growth in the money supply in past years, and an inconsistent money growth policy.

I believe we must find a reasonable level of money growth, consistent with the production of real goods, and stick to it. This, of course, does not mean that the Federal Reserve Board should keep the money supply as low as it was earlier this year, because certainly this policy has created hardships in a number of industries. But it should guard against a sudden new explosion of money which will lead us on a roller coaster ride toward higher and higher inflation.

THE CASUALTIES

It is of immediate importance that we turn now to the development and expansion of programs which will care for the casualties of recession.

I believe that we have the responsibility to provide for human needs of people who are put out of work.

As a first step, we should stretch out or extend unemployment benefits for at least 13 weeks beyond its current limit, so that our people will have some continuity to their income.

Second. We must put into place an adequate program of public service employment which will provide meaningful temporary job opportunities for those who are laid off for relatively short periods of time. The program should be directed toward meeting the many needs of communities throughout the country. These needs include such things as land and water conservation, improvement of land transportation facilities, and community development problems.

I also think it desirable to proceed with Government assisted programs, that prior to this time, have been moving at a slower pace than originally intended because of budget restrictions.

There are many water, sewer, and transportation projects which have been curtailed for various reasons. The release of funds for the already authorized programs would provide a much needed stimulus. Particular attention should be given to those where the job benefit rate is high; that is those programs that produce higher numbers of jobs in proportion to the amount of money spent.

In a country as affluent as ours, there should certainly be the desire, capability and responsibility to insure that all our citizens are cared for as well as possible, as we work our way out of trying economic conditions.

TAXES

The two most important powers of Congress are to raise revenues and to appropriate funds. We have previously discussed the general policy our Nation should adhere to when considering the appropriations process, and now I would like to turn to recommendations concerning tax policies.

First, since 1969, the Congress has yet to look comprehensively at our Nation's tax program. Therefore, I believe it is imperative the 94th Congress put, as its first priority, comprehensive and meaningful tax reform.

It has been suggested by some, including the President, that we increase Federal income taxes in order to provide more revenue so as to more closely balance our budget.

On the other hand, it has also been suggested by some that we reduce Federal income taxes in order to spur additional economic activity.

It is my opinion that we should do neither. A tax increase at the present time would work unnecessary hardships on the majority of American citizens. By the same token, a broad tax reduction would be contrary to the long-term economic interest of this country because it would contribute to our already massive Federal deficit and add fuel to the fires of inflation, which fortunately show signs of easing.

What we should do is seek tax reform. I think it is possible to reduce taxes for lower- and middle-income people, at the same time as we close the loopholes which exist in our current tax laws. Among these loopholes are those which allow people in the very high tax brackets to avoid payment of any taxes. Thus, I believe that the present minimum tax should be strengthened.

Third, I think it is desirable to reform the tax laws to encourage investment of capital in our economy. Increased capital accumulation generates new jobs and expands our tax base. Unfortunately, this Nation is low on the list of the world nations in terms of capital accumulation and formation and I believe we must take a close look at all our tax laws to encourage the expansion and development of our capital resources.

I also think it is necessary that we do away with favored treatment for persons and businesses which, although justified at one time, are no longer serving the purpose for which they were created.

Above all, our tax system should be fair and equitable and its equity should be apparent to all of the American people. There must be confidence that all the taxpayers of America are being treated equally. These exclusions and special treatments do not encourage that type of thinking and thus, I think it is in the long-term national interest that we, to the extent possible, eliminate unnecessary tax preferences.

A discussion of our economic situation would not, of course, be complete without reference to our Nation's energy problems.

The tremendous increases which have occurred in petroleum-related products in the past year have found their way into every aspect of our economy and have contributed, probably more than any other factor, to spiraling price increases in a number of commodities.

The only way to lower energy costs is to increase our domestic supply. The market is doing this in many instances because the high price of gasoline and other petroleum-based products have made it more attractive to explore unreachable oil deposits.

Additionally, after long years of haggling, the Congress last year enacted legislation to permit the construction of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline, and this development will significantly increase our fuel supplies in the lower 48 States.

Third, I think it is necessary that we diligently explore possibilities of oil development off the coasts of our Nation. All indications point to the fact that there are massive deposits of petroleum and natural gas in our Outer Continental Shelf, and I think it would be irresponsible for us to allow unnecessary roadblocks in the path of prompt and systematic development of these resources. I recognize that there are environmental risks in this situation, both from spills and, even more significantly, from related onshore development. But I believe that, with existing technology and prior planning, these risks can be minimized.

Our efforts should be spent in the creation of a policy that will allow us to take advantage of these resources and protect the public interests rather than one of trying to prevent the development of an additional supply of energy.

I also believe that we must deregulate the price of natural gas, so as to permit a more reasonable return to producers.

At a time when there are significant shortages in natural gas in my part of the country, we hear reports wells are being capped because of the relatively small return on investment which is available to those who produce interstate gas. Although we must guard against windfall profits in this instance, I do believe it is the time for Congress to take a look at this situation, and move expeditiously to provide the incentives by which American people will have an adequate supply of natural gas.

One segment of our economy which is particularly hard hit during this recession, and thus deserves special attention, is the housing industry. Housing activity has declined for the last 4 consecutive months, and now is some 33 percent below the pace set only a year ago. Even more discouraging is the fact that the issuance of new building permits, an accurate barometer of future housing activity, is down 42 percent from October 1973, and has now reached the lowest point since December 1966.

The housing decline has serious short- and long-term implications. Currently, the unemployment rate in the construction industry is 13.9 percent, more than double the nationwide rate of all workers. Additionally, slackening demand by the industry for raw materials and finished products has had severe ripple effects in other parts of our economy.

Should this situation continue, we will face a significant housing shortage in this country. It is therefore incumbent on the Congress that we do all we can to stimulate housing.

The Congress has passed, and the President has signed into law, S. 3979, the Emergency Home Purchase Assistance Act, which is designed to pump $7.75 billion into the housing market. The President has committed some $3 billion of that amount, and I hope he will implement this legislation as rapidly as possible.

We must continue to respond to the needs of this industry, and I hope the Congress will consider early in the coming session further legislation to aid this industry.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Further, just as there are individual casualties in times of economic recession, so too are there many businesses who are forced to the brink of financial collapse. Therefore, it is most desirable that we recreate a program similar to that sponsored under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to help failing businesses by providing loans to assist their capital requirements.

ANTITRUST ACTIONS

Additionally, the Federal Government should vigorously enforce the antitrust laws now on the books in order to assure that the maximum amount of competition exists in the marketplace.

WHAT WE SHOULD NOT DO

Although there are, as I pointed out, some significant actions the Federal Government can and should take to strengthen our economy, there are also some actions which have been advocated by others which I believe it should not take. We must guard against the temptation, in this period of economic downturn, to do too much to our economy. The free market system, with all its imperfections, has served us quite well in the past, and I think any unnecessary tinkering will create greater distortions and misallocations in the future.

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

One particular action which I strongly oppose is wage and price controls. I think it is extremely important that we do not resort to the imposition of these controls. As politically attractive as wage and price controls seem to be in the short run, they would be detrimental to our Nation's long-term interest.

In my judgment, those who offer wage and price controls as a panacea for all of our present economic problems, are opting for illusory solutions at the expense of sound economic policy.

The available evidence indicates there is no major industrial democracy that has been able to impose wage and price controls effectively in peacetime without causing great problems for itself. The results have generally been misallocation of resources and inventories, inefficiency in the marketplace, a growth of black markets, and a rising dissatisfaction on the part of the people who are subject to controls. Experience has shown that under controls, prices tended to rise, and wages lagged behind these price increases. In fact, we have to look no further than our Nation's recent history to understand the failure of this policy of economic controls. On August 15, 1971, when controls were placed into effect, the inflation rate was 3.7 percent. Two and one-half years later, with the expiration of controls, that same inflation rate had tripled to a rate of 10.8 percent. Additionally, we then had to contend with control induced shortages in everything from steel to hamburger, shortages which are only now being overcome.

Ironically, if wage and price controls are imposed, it would be the American worker who would be most hurt by such action. This is because it is much easier—barring the establishment of a massive new Federal bureaucracy—to control wages than control prices. If controls were imposed tomorrow, wages would be frozen but prices, because of the intricacies of the marketplace, would continue to rise and reduce individual purchasing power. Thus, I hope that such a policy will not be advocated by the President or the Congress.

Although recent trends indicate a bleak picture, there are encouraging signs for the future.

Prime interest rates are declining and now hover at a level of about 10 percent.

The U.S. trade balance has improved, too. In September shortfall of the Nation's trade balance totaled $233 million, considerably less than the $1.13 billion trade deficit registered in August.

The earnings for American workers are up slightly. After tax earnings of a typical worker, adjusted for the loss of purchasing power caused by inflation, rose 0.1 percent in September, but are still 5.2 percent below a year ago.

Finally, shortages in the number of commodities are disappearing.

There is another sign that is positive and is one which will be of great value, I believe, in the long run.

Judging from my mail and from my constituent contact, there seems to be a growing awareness and understanding of the economic facts of life by the public. More and more, people are not only understanding why we are experiencing an economic downturn, but more importantly they know what we should do and should not do to remedy the situation.

For many years, good politics have not necessarily led to good economics. Government told the public indeed what the public wanted to hear, not what it should hear. But I believe that situation is changing. The public is demanding a new sense of fiscal responsibility and such demands can only lead to an improvement in our economic and political life.

By responding to this concern, the Federal Government will encourage Americans to have confidence in their own system. By having that confidence, we will assist the economy, since it is a barometer of the public mood, to overcome our present difficulties and move once again toward prosperity.

Although government, through fiscal and monetary policy, plays an important role, we should not delude the people of this country into believing that government can or should provide all the answers to our current dilemma. Certainly government must provide the leadership in developing programs that will provide the framework within which our free and flexible economy can react and change.

But it should not bear complete responsibility. Government can contribute to public confidence and to the maintenance of the market by providing general guidelines, but taking specific actions only when they are essential to the protection of the free market system. By these actions, government can show that it too has confidence in the system.

THE MARKETPLACE

There is one other point I would like to make today, and that is Americans should not stay away from the marketplace.

If there are goods and services which we need and can afford, then I think that we should go out and buy those goods and services after satisfying ourselves that we are getting the best buy available. It makes no sense to tell the American people not to buy when in fact they can afford to buy and need the goods and services that are being offered for sale. The only admonition should be to use care in the selection of the items being bought so that we are assured of getting the highest quality for the best price available. If Americans stay away from the marketplace, most assuredly we will be a long time recovering from our present economic difficulties. But if Americans recognize that our problems are short term in nature, the American economic system, within the structural framework of our democratic society, has both the flexibility and vitality to generate continual growth and thus provide the foundation for new and increased opportunities for an ever growing number of citizens.

There weren't always such routes, of course. Although the Constitution authorized Congress "to establish Post Offices and Post Roads," mail only came as far as the addressee's nearest post office.

For a time, independent deliverers picked up mail—for a fee. In 1863 post offices hired mailmen for free home delivery—in cities with over 10,000 residents. As a result, in 1890, 20-million Americans had free mail delivery; 55-million did not.

Several postmasters led the fight for Rural Free Delivery. It would, some said, destroy the isolation of the countryside and stem the "deplorable drift" of citizens from the country to the towns. These same supporters later advocated another radical move called Parcel Post. Their ranks included men named Richard W. Sears, Alvah C. Roebuck and A. Montgomery Ward.

By 1900 many rural mail routes were established and by 1913 President Wilson received his first Parcel Post package—eight pounds of New Jersey apples.

It was the historian Daniel Doorstin has written, "the least herald and in some ways the most important communications revolution in American history."

has to brave bad weather, poor roads and other obstacles to get the mail through. According to the article, his customers include descendants of early homesteaders who have either returned from or avoided the cities in favor of enjoying a high degree of independence in the back country. Mr. Lane's dedication reflects credit not only on himself but on the other 30,724 men and women who deliver the mail to more than 12.5 million Americans, many of whom live in similarly remote areas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this New York Times article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 18, 1974]
RURAL POSTMAN DEFIES ALL: SNOW, GLOOM, AND MOOSE

(By Andrew H. Malcolm)

HUNGRY HORSE, MONT.—Just about every letter that Virgil Lane delivers in these parts is a special delivery.

It's not that they cost extra or go out at all hours of the day or night. It's just that they are so dashed hard to deliver.

For Virgil Lane is a rural mail carrier, one of 30,725 men and women who haul letters and magazines and newspapers and junk ads to more than 12.5-million Americans, many of them living on isolated lanes yet unlined by electric and telephone wires.

To these Americans the regular arrival of the mail brings much more than a few pieces of paper. It is the main means of communication with the world. And at holiday times like these, with families far-flung and stores dozens of rugged miles away, mail day can be a very important occasion.

On some 30-below winter days, Mr. Lane may drive his 120-mile route through a snowstorm in the woods on a dirt road by the cliff near Canada to deliver a mere handful of letters. Only once was he ever late. But that was the fault of moose that blocked his path.

"It's a tough enough route," says the 51-year-old Mr. Lane. And especially nowadays with snow accumulating to the seven-foot annual level.

THE MAILMAN IN HISTORY

There weren't always such routes, of course. Although the Constitution authorized Congress "to establish Post Offices and Post Roads," mail only came as far as the addressee's nearest post office.

For a time, independent deliverers picked up mail—for a fee. In 1863 post offices hired mailmen for free home delivery—in cities with over 10,000 residents. As a result, in 1890, 20-million Americans had free mail delivery; 55-million did not.

Several postmasters led the fight for Rural Free Delivery. It would, some said, destroy the isolation of the countryside and stem the "deplorable drift" of citizens from the country to the towns. These same supporters later advocated another radical move called Parcel Post. Their ranks included men named Richard W. Sears, Alvah C. Roebuck and A. Montgomery Ward.

By 1900 many rural mail routes were established and by 1913 President Wilson received his first Parcel Post package—eight pounds of New Jersey apples.

It was the historian Daniel Doorstin has written, "the least herald and in some ways the most important communications revolution in American history."

The people around Hungry Horse named for a skinny horse found here once, would probably go along with that—to a point.

Last year the Postal Service proudly proposed that twice weekly deliveries on Mr. Lane's route be increased 50 per cent.

MORE MAIL, MORE PEOPLE

This prompted great opposition, however. As one old-timer put it, "More mail means more people."

Descendants of early homesteaders, these aging residents have either fled from or avoided the cities in favor of the back country where they can live by their own rules.

There are, for instance, only two signs along Mr. Lane's mail route. And neither one of them orders anyone to do anything. One sign says: "Warning: Road Width Varies Next 22 Miles."

The other sign is somewhat more comprehensive: "Polebridge Store Beer Cafe Groceries Cabins Western Souvenirs Ice Camp Grounds Fishing Hunting Camping Supplies U.S. Post Office Propane Bottles Filled Eddy's Bread Better By Far 1/4 Mile."

Mr. Lane's workday begins at 4 A.M. in his home near here. By 5 he is in Kalispell, picking up all the mail for Columbia Falls, Hungry Horse and four other communities. He drops the sacks off at the appropriate post office and reverses the process at night.

But twice a week—on Tuesdays and Fridays—he also wheels his truck up the North Fork, a twisting, rutted, unpatrolled one-lane dirt road that parallels the western boundary of Glacier National Park right up to the cleared strip of land and the open gate that marks the international boundary with Canada. For these 104 roundtrips each year Mr. Lane, a private mail contractor, earns $5,063.88 for his time, gas and maintenance.

In the back of his truck, like a spare tire, Mr. Lane carries a snowmobile for those last 15 miles when the snow usually overcomes his truck. He straps the mail sacks on his back and heads down the road where the only litter is pine cones, used antlers and other wild animal droppings.

ROAD PLOWED RARELY

"The snow isn't really too bad," says Mr. Lane, "the county plows the road out once or twice a year." The county, which is named Flathead, is 363 times larger than Manhattan with 1/39th the population.

Six miles out of town he stops at Merle Hulford's mailbox, the first of 18 stops. Then comes Lloyd McCrory's and Clarence Rose's.

Then the road climbs. "A couple people got killed last winter here," says Mr. Lane. "Didn't make that turn." He points 150 feet down to the river.

Then on through the pines around Fool Hen Hill by Cyclone Point and Strawberry Lookout, where Mr. Lane encounters a car. "How about that?" he says. "You know in the summer here with the campers and all it's like Grand Central Station. You see two, maybe three, cars a day."

Two hours later he reaches Polebridge, a cluster of cabins and a general store with white wisps of smoke rising in the crisp mountain air. There by the big barrel of peanuts, Mr. Lane leaves some mail with Bob Olson for distant residents to pick up sometime.

He switches on his four-wheel drive and heads toward Canada past the Hullsinger place, the Wilsons, and the home of Lloyd Sondreson and Tom Reynolds, a 79-year-old hermit who rides a Honda out to the mailbox.

RESPECT FOR MOOSE

Then there's Bill Atkinson, a self-proclaimed mountaineer who fashions his own clothes from buckskin.

"Right in here is where the animals are," says Mr. Lane. Sometimes in deep snow the moose and elk prefer to travel on the road, a right Mr. Lane does not deny them if only because enraged moose have been known to charge freight trains let alone little pick-up trucks with fragile radiators in front.

"One day," Mr. Lane recalled "it took me three hours to go nine miles. Every so often they'd just lie down for a little snooze."

The last mail stop is for Joe Bush, probably the only Canadian to get all his mail from the United States. Mr. Bush, who gave up an urban plumbing business to build a home in the woods, owns 300 yards inside Canada. But he meets Mr. Lane at the border for his mail, which regularly includes the next lessons for his 10-year-old daughter Tracey in her Canadian Government correspondence courses.

Then begins the long drive back to town, picking up the outgoing mail in boxes with the red flag flipped up. If Mr. Lane is not back by 5 P.M., a rescue team is dispatched.

"Sometimes," said Mr. Lane, "the beauty up here almost knocks your eyes out—the trees covered with snow, the mountains standing over everything like white ghosts, the rush of the wind in the treetops. Some days you can watch a complete avalanche over there. And you realize how small you really are."

One recent evening as this mailman returned home for dinner after 14 hours of work. He noticed a piece of paper in his vest pocket.

Mr. Lane, who since dawn had delivered hundreds of letters, passed countless mailboxes and hauled several tons of mail to and from a half-dozen post offices, had forgotten to mail a letter from his son to a girlfriend. And anyway, the Lanes were out of stamps.

OIL COMPANY COMPLIANCE WITH THE TRUTH IN NEGOTIATIONS ACT AND THE COST ACCOUNTING STANDARDS BOARD

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, it has recently come to my attention that the oil companies have once again been less than fully cooperative with the Department of Defense in furnishing vitally needed petroleum supplies. Specifically I refer to attempts by the oil companies to force the Department to enter into contracts without supplying certain cost and pricing data required under the Truth in Negotiations Act and complying with certain cost accounting standards promulgated by the Cost Accounting Standards Board and applicable to all Defense contracts.

Denying the Government this information would prevent the Government from determining whether the prices to be paid for petroleum supplies by the Department are reasonable. Too often, both the executive and legislative branches have been denied information critical to ascertaining the reasonableness of oil company profits and prices. Certainly here, where we have statutory guidelines, waivers and exemptions should not be granted unless a compelling case has first been made for the necessity of such action.

The Department of Defense, acting on behalf of the oil companies, recently informed the Cost Accounting Standards Board that waivers would be sought in as many as one hundred Department of Defense contracts with oil companies totaling approximately $1 billion.

When these facts came to my attention, I wrote the Honorable Elmer B.

Staats, Chairman of the Cost Accounting Standards Board and the Honorable James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense, requesting that I be informed before any such waivers were granted and that all requests be carefully scrutinized.

On December 16, 1974, Mr. Staats replied that the Cost Accounting Standards Board had declined the Department of Defense waiver request made on behalf of Mobil Oil Corp. This contract was estimated to be $6,787,928 for 1975 petroleum requirements in Turkey.

Finally, on December 17 the Federal Energy Administration issued a ruling to the Department of Defense that its petroleum allocation and pricing regulations in no way obviate the necessity of the oil companies complying with the cost and pricing requirements of the statutes.

Mr. President, it now appears that after some initial reluctance on the part of some officials of the Department of Defense, all affected Government organizations—the Department of Defense, the Federal Energy Administration and the Cost Accounting Standards Board—stand firm in their position that oil companies contracting with the Department of Defense must supply the necessary cost and pricing data and comply with standard cost accounting procedures.

I will continue to monitor this subject and I have directed the staff of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations to follow developments and to develop a complete report on this subject.

Mr. President, under the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act, the oil companies must supply the Defense Department with its domestic requirements. This is not, however, true with respect to furnishing foreign supplies to our military. I note again that the waiver denied by the Cost Accounting Standards Board deals with Defense requirements for Turkey.

I would caution Mobil Oil Co. and any other oil company supplying petroleum products to our forces overseas to comply not only with the letter and spirit of the law, but also to exercise prudence and judgment in the best interests of the United States. I did not think that prudence and the best judgment were exercised by our major oil companies with regard to the cutoff of oil to our military in the aftermath of the 1973 Arab-Israeli war.

Mr. President, there should be no question of our Armed Forces, both here and abroad, getting all the petroleum products they need pursuant to contracts to be governed by all normal statutes and regulations.

And there should be no question of the Department of Defense obtaining the cost and pricing data necessary for them to determine whether the prices they pay for petroleum products are fair and reasonable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letters and materials referred to in my remarks be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS, SENATE PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS,
Washington, D.C., December 11, 1974.

HON. ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General, Chairman, Cost Accounting Standards Board, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I fully appreciate the important role of the Cost Accounting Standards Board in providing uniform and consistent cost-accounting principles for defense contractors engaged by the Federal Government. You have my unequivocal support in the effort to secure greater rationality and fairness in government procurement matters.

I am deeply disturbed by reports that several oil companies, contracted to supply petroleum products to the Department of Defense for the first six months of 1975, may refuse to comply with certain regulations and disclosure requirements promulgated by your Board. I am further concerned by allegations that the Department of Defense may seek an exemption from such requirements on behalf of the oil contractors. Such an exemption would raise significant questions of policy, since some sixty-eight oil companies and $1 billion in supply contracts would be affected.

As Chairman of the Senate Interior Committee and the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, and to discharge their continuing oversight responsibilities, I have requested my staff to undertake a preliminary inquiry into the propriety of the contemplated exemption. Given the enormous implications of this matter for national security and energy policies, it is requested that you inform me should any such exemption request come before the Board.

You have my continuing support and assistance in your endeavors.

Sincerely,
HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman.

Washington, D.C., December 16, 1974.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In accordance with S. Res. 269 of the 93rd Congress, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which I chair, has conducted oversight inquiries and hearings into all aspects of energy supplies, prices and policies. You will recall that on April 22nd of this year, the Subcommittee heard testimony on the cutoff of petroleum products to our military forces in the aftermath of the October 1973 Arab-Israeli War. Let me thank you again for your outstanding cooperation during the course of that investigation.

Our continuing monitoring of the energy area has uncovered another situation involving petroleum supplies to the United States Military which merits further inquiry. Accordingly, I have directed staff to undertake a comprehensive preliminary inquiry and by this letter request that you again render your cooperation so that we might obtain all of the facts in this matter.

We understand that the major suppliers of petroleum products now faced with negotiated rather than competitive bid contracts, have balked at supplying the accompanying cost data and complying with cost accounting standards required by statute and regulation. Specifically, these include supplying and certifying cost and pricing data under the Truth in Negotiations Act (P.L. 87-653) and conforming with cost-accounting standards promulgated by the Cost Accounting Standards Board (CASB) under P.L. 91-379.

We further understand that some oil companies have warned that unless they are relieved of such requirements they will not be able to contract with the Department of Defense for fuel supplies for the first six months of 1975. Finally, we understand that the oil companies and DoD have had discussions on the possibility of obtaining waivers of the two statutory requirements or requesting the Federal Energy Administration to issue a ruling stating that they are exempt from the CASB standards. As you know, only the CASB can waive its standards while DoD has authority to unilaterally waive the requirements of the Truth in Negotiations Act.

In my opinion, the only way to determine whether the prices to be paid by the Department of Defense are reasonable is to insure that the oil companies comply with the cost standards established by law and regulation. Accordingly, I have written the Chairman of the Cost Accounting Standards Board, the Honorable Elmer B. Staats, requesting that I be informed before any waiver request is granted by the Board.

Likewise, I am requesting that you inform me prior to the Department's waiving the requirements of the Truth in Negotiation Act in contracts negotiated between the Departments of Defense and the oil companies. Such waivers should be withheld until they have been carefully scrutinized and the ramifications of such action properly evaluated.

Too often both the Executive and Legislative Branches have been denied information critical to establishing oil company profits and pricing. We cannot, without the most thorough reflection, allow these companies to avoid supplying data required by law of other large companies.

In addition, I also would like to know how the Department of Defense came to find itself in this position. Specifically, it is important to have a chronology of events which required "eleventh hour" decisions as well as all relevant documentation.

Accordingly, I request that you supply the following information:

1. A description and chronology of the Department's petroleum procurement process, including all pertinent dates at which procurement decisions for 1975 supplies were taken.

2. A copy of the September 24, 1974, letter sent to the prospective oil contractors by the Defense Fuel Supply Center, and copies of all responses thereto.

3. A copy of the Department's letter of November 22, 1974, to the prospective oil contractors and copies of all responses heretofore received.

4. Copies of all communications, documents and memoranda relating to the Department's request for waivers of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause from the Cost Accounting Standards Board.

5. Copies of all communications, documents and memoranda relating to the Department's request for petroleum pricing information from the Federal Energy Administration which would support a market or regulated price exemption for the prospective oil contractors.

6. Copies of all internal communications, documents and memoranda relating to the Department's efforts a) to obtain pricing information supporting a market or regulated price exemption for the petroleum suppliers or, b) to secure a waiver of the requirements of P.L. 87-653 and P.L. 91-379 on behalf of these suppliers.

I appreciate your cooperation and assistance in resolving the important questions raised which bear upon the efficacy of our petroleum procurement program, the FEA allocation process and the role of the oil companies in these critical areas.

Sincerely,
HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—SENATE

COST ACCOUNTING STANDARDS BOARD,
Washington, D.C., December 18, 1974.

SENATOR HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman, Permanent Investigating Subcommittee, Government Operations Committee, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SCOOP: Your letter of December 11, 1974, asked me to inform you if any request for an exemption from the Cost Accounting Standards Clause in proposed Department of Defense contracts for petroleum products was received by the Cost Accounting Standards Board.

By letter dated December 5, 1974, from Assistant Secretary of Defense Mendolla, the Department of Defense requested the Cost Accounting Standards Board to waive the obligation to include the Cost Accounting Standards Clause in a proposed Department of Defense contract for its 1975 petroleum requirements in Turkey with Mobil Oil Corporation. The proposed contract was estimated to be $6,787,928; officials of the Department of Defense informed the Cost Accounting Standards Board that similar waivers would be sought for possibly as many as one hundred Department of Defense contracts with oil companies for 1975 petroleum requirements in the United States and abroad. They estimated that the total of these contracts would be approximately $1 billion.

At its meeting on December 13, 1974, the Cost Accounting Standards Board declined to grant the requested waiver for the proposed contract with the Mobil Oil Corporation. The Board's action, which is fully explained in a letter to Assistant Secretary Mendolla, a copy of which is enclosed, was based on the Board's conviction that Mobil has offered no reasons, and the Board knows of no reasons, why Mobil would be unable to comply fully with the requirements of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause.

Staff of the Cost Accounting Standards Board will be available to discuss this matter further with your Staff if you wish.

Sincerely yours,
ELMER B. STAATS,
Chairman.

COST ACCOUNTING STANDARDS BOARD,
Washington, D.C., December 13, 1974.

HON. ARTHUR I. MENDOLLA,
Assistant Secretary of Defense
(Installations & Logistics),
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MENDOLLA: A letter dated December 5, 1974, from the Acting Assistant Secretary of Defense (I&L) requests the Cost Accounting Standards Board to waive inclusion of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause in a proposed Department of Defense (DOD) contract with the Mobil Oil Corporation for the supply of 1975 DOD requirements of fuels and lubricants in Turkey. In its consideration of this matter, the Board has had the benefit of additional information supplied informally by your staff and has had an opportunity for extensive discussions with Mr. Babione, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Procurement), and other DOD representatives at the Board meeting on December 13.

The Board noted that Mobil Oil Corporation has not unequivocally refused to accept the CAS Clause, but has said instead that it is unable to comply with it. It has stated that it is unable to provide a meaningful Disclosure Statement and further that it is unable to accept the inclusion of the obligation to comply with Cost Accounting Standards.

The Board is convinced that Mobil's position is not well founded. The DOD letter of December 5, 1974, enclosed a letter of April 2, 1974, from the Controller of the Mobil Oil Corporation to the Defense Fuel Supply Center. The Controller there stated that Mobil is unable to provide the Government with a meaningful Disclosure Statement for petroleum products. However, the Disclosure Statement requires only that a potential defense contractor describe fully the cost accounting practices he will use in performance of a contemplated contract. There is nothing in the Disclosure Statement which would preclude a firm using a joint-cost system, which Mobil states that it uses, from completing the Disclosure Statement. The Board, for example, has received to date copies of 69 Disclosure Statements from firms which employ process-cost systems, and these Disclosure Statements have been accepted by the Defense Contract Audit Agency as complete and accurate statements of the cost accounting practices of those firms. A firm using a joint-cost system can be considered as using a refinement of a process-cost system, and there is no reason why it cannot describe its proposed cost accounting practices in a Disclosure Statement.

The Board considered carefully the comment also made by the Controller of the Mobil Oil Corporation in his April 2, 1974, letter that a company using a joint-cost system would be unable to comply with any promulgated Cost Accounting Standard. The Board concluded that the promulgated Cost Accounting Standards can be followed fully by firms using joint-cost systems, just as they are being followed by firms using other cost accounting systems.

The Board recognized the possibility that a proposed future Cost Accounting Standard might not be susceptible to compliance by a firm using a joint-cost system. The Board would expect that if such a circumstance were to arise, Mobil and other firms using joint-cost systems would so inform the Board through their comments on proposed Standards. In such a case, the Board could provide appropriate modification of the proposal or could, if it deemed appropriate, exempt firms using joint-cost systems from the application of the Cost Accounting Standard in question. In any event, by accepting the Cost Accounting Standards Clause in current procurements, Mobil would not thereby agree to comply with any future Cost Accounting Standard.

The Board noted that there is no indication from the materials submitted to the Board or from Mr. Babione that any officials of the Department of Defense who understand the accounting aspects of the Disclosure Statement and application of Cost Accounting Standards have raised and discussed with appropriate officials of Mobil the basis for the reasons why Mobil believes it cannot submit a Disclosure Statement or comply with Cost Accounting Standards. As indicated above, the Board is convinced, on the basis of the present record, that full compliance by Mobil with the CAS Clause is entirely feasible and is required.

For these reasons, the Board has declined to grant the requested waiver.

Sincerely yours,
ARTHUR SCHOENHAUT,
Executive Secretary

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., December 1974.

HON. ELMER B. STAATS,
Chairman, Cost Accounting Standards Board,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STAATS: Pursuant to Cost Accounting Standards Board Regulation 331.30, it is requested that a waiver of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause be approved to permit award of a contract to Mobil Oil Corporation (DSA-75-5). We believe the attached document is responsive to the requirements of 331.30.

We would appreciate consideration of this request at the Board meeting on 13 December in order to meet the urgent procurement requirements.

Sincerely,

PAUL H. RILEY,
Acting Assistant Secretary of Defense, (Installations and Logistics).

REQUEST AND JUSTIFICATION FOR WAIVER OF COST ACCOUNTING STANDARDS CLAUSE: PRO-POSED CONTRACT WITH MOBIL OIL CORPORA-TION (DSA-75-5)

This request for waiver covers an indefinite quantity contract for the supply of the following petroleum products to 33 military locations in Turkey. These locations as well as their missions are of a classified nature; further information will be provided if required.

Product	Quantity (Gallons)
Diesel Fuel Oil, No. 2-----	11,807,000
Motor Gasoline, Premium Grade-----	1,902,000
Kerosene-----	554,180
Aviation Gasoline, 115/145-----	11,500
Turbine Fuel, JP-4-----	21,500
Fourteen Types of Lubricating Oils, Greases and Solvents-----	127,780

The contract period is 1 January 1975 through 31 December 1975. The estimated value of the contract is $6,787,928. The contractor provides services relative to the storage, handling and distribution of these products. The estimated value of the petroleum products is $5,537,264 and the estimated value of services is $1,250,664. The buying activity is the Defense Supply Agency, Directorate of Procurement and Production, Defense Fuel Supply Center (DFSC), Cameron Station, Alexandria, Virginia 22314. The proposed contractor is Mobil Oil Corporation, 150 East 42nd Street, New York, New York 10017. The fuel oil, gasoline, kerosene and aviation fuels are supplied from Mobil's overseas affiliates; the lubricating oils and other miscellaneous packaged products originate from various sources in the United States.

Pursuant to the Cost Accounting Standards Regulation 4 C.F.R. 331.30, subparagraph (c) (1), the following specific information is furnished:

(i) The proposed contractor has refused unequivocally by letters of 2 Apr 74 and 30 Aug 74, and message of 16 Sep 74 (Attachments 1, 2 and 3, respectively) to accept this contract or any future contract containing the Cost Accounting Standards Clause relative to the supply of petroleum products. In connection with contracts for services only, i.e., storage, handling and distribution of petroleum products or contracts for petroleum products which contain clearly identifiable service costs, Mobil has agreed (Attachments 4, 5 and 6) to the inclusion of the clause applicable only to the services portion of the contract, subject however, to the deletion of paragraphs (d) and (e). Mobil has been unsuccessful in its attempts to obtain their trucking subcontractor's agreement to the inclusion of the clause and they do not qualify for one of the exemptions set forth in the clause. The estimated value of this subcontract is $213,000. Further, Mobil states that they presume that unless an alternate solution is agreed upon, they will be unable to offer against any future negotiated procurements and that they may have to withdraw their offer under the Turkey procurement.

Mobil's rationale for refusal is that the Disclosure Statement and the Standards appear to be designed for manufacturing, construction and service industries which can assign or allocate costs to individual products or contracts. Mobil maintains this is not possible in a joint cost industry. In a joint cost operation, the incurrence of the principal costs (materials or labor or capital, as the case may be) necessarily produces two or more products or services simultaneously. If it is not possible to avoid producing certain products or services when producing other products or services, there can be no separate cost for each of the individual products or services; only the cost for all of the joint products or services is known. Mobil is a producer and refiner of crude oil. In petroleum refining, the principal costs are for crude oil, labor and capital, and the refining process by its nature results in a spectrum of products from gasoline to residual fuel oil. Consequently Mobil's position is that it is not possible for the petroleum refining industry (or for Mobil) to compute a cost for an individual product or for an individual product sold under a specific contract. The only costs which are known are (a) the costs for all the products produced in a refinery and (b) the costs of the various processes or functions. The items in the Disclosure Statement refer with great frequency to accounting practices for costs charged to "Government contracts or similar cost objectives". Because of the joint cost problem, the "final cost objective" in Mobil's normal accounting is the function or department and sub-function or sub-department within each. None of these "final cost objectives" is "similar" to Government contracts, for which the Disclosure Statement is designed to disclose the relevant cost accounting practices.

The contractor has furnished cost and pricing data in support of the prices for the services portion of the contract. Contractor has refused to furnish cost and pricing data for the products portion of the contract. Moreover, the contractor has refused to provide market (or published/catalog) prices necessary to establish an exemption from the inclusion of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause as well as the exemption from the requirements of cost and pricing data.

(ii) The proposed contractor has accepted one contract (Number DSA-600-73-D-0921) with the Defense Fuel Supply Center containing the Cost Accounting Standards Clause. This contract, in the amount of $831,920 was for diesel fuel oil (DF-2) for delivery to two locations in Ethiopia during the period 1 Apr 73-31 Mar 74. However, Mobil alleges in their message of 25 Sep 74 (Attachment 7) that they were exempt from the clause because of their monetary exemption from the requirements of submitting a Disclosure Statement. This misunderstanding on Mobil's part has been rectified.

(iii) The estimated total amount of the proposed contract with Mobil is $6,787,928; the estimated amount for petroleum products is $5,537,264 and the estimated balance of $1,250,664 is for the in-country storage, handling and delivery services. The sum of all awards by the Department of Defense to Mobil in each of the past three fiscal years is as follows:

Fiscal Year 1972-----	$110,149,000

(iv) There are no other sources of supply available in Turkey to provide the required products and services on a timely basis.

(v) There are no practical alternative methods of supply for these products. If the above cited requirements cannot be purchased from Mobil, which is the only supplier capable of furnishing these products to the various locations, it will be necessary for the U.S. Air Force to establish a military supply system within Turkey. The system could be established in several different ways, but regardless of the system, additional terminal facilities and U.S. military personnel would be required. Such action would require a new Government to Government agreement. To increase the presence of U.S.

military in Turkey would be difficult. But in this case, the increase in military would be at the expense of the local employment and revenue and it is doubtful such a proposal would be approved. Moreover, it would be a very long and difficult process to establish a military supply system in Turkey. There are 33 locations in Turkey which require support. Many of these sites are remote and access is over unsurfaced roads. Some of the larger locations have as many as 14 individual bulk drop points. Five bulk fuels are handled which would require terminal tankage at a minimum of two locations capable of receipt by T-2 size tanker. Two grades of product are currently stocked in one area by the U.S. military. In addition, a capability would have to be established to handle 14 different items packaged in containers from 35 pound pails to 55 gallon drums. A variety of transportation equipment would be required. The large deliveries are made in transport trucks with other requirements covered by varying sizes of tank wagons. The current supplier uses vehicles capable of hauling both bulk and packaged products for the support of the remote locations. The requirement can be most economically handled by an established commercial company within its current capability as is the present practice. The most expeditious method to establish a military supply system would be to contract for existing facilities, equipment and services; however, it is extremely doubtful terminal facilities could be obtained. Due to the high cost of construction, oil companies provide only the minimum tankage to support operations. In Izmir, one of the major terminals on the west coast of Turkey has been recently closed by the Turkish Government for ecology reasons. With this loss, ability to contract for terminal facilities was virtually lost, thus leaving new construction as the only means of providing required support. Construction at its best is a long process and in no way could be made available to support 1 Jan.-31 Dec. 75 requirements. If product is not made available, the Air Force will not be able to accomplish its essential mission in Turkey.

(vi) Mobil has been the sole source supplier for these products and services for many years and is the only company capable of furnishing the total requirements. DFSC has continually exerted efforts to encourage those firms who have marketing operations in Turkey to submit offers against the requirements but has had no success due to lack of facilities and delivery capability of possible suppliers. Such efforts will be continued for future procurements; however, due to the current petroleum shortage, it is unlikely that any other company would offer to supply these products.

(vii) In the past (FY 72 and FY 73), prior to the energy shortage, approximately 29 percent of the approximately 3,900 contracts awarded by DFSC was in excess of $100,000. All of the purchases made by the Defense Fuel Supply Center for petroleum products originating from overseas areas for delivery to overseas locations were negotiated pursuant to 10 USC 2304(a) (6). Approximately 90 percent of the remaining contracts for the domestic requirements were solicited and awarded in accordance with formal advertising procedures. During the current petroleum crisis the Federal Energy Administration promulgated an allocation program under which the product must be procured from designated suppliers. Consequently, formal advertising has been precluded for the duration of the FEA Allocation Program. Approximately $3,500,000,000 of petroleum products are to be procured during FY 75, of which at least 95 percent must be procured under negotiated contracts exceeding $100,000.

In the past, prices published in various petroleum trade journals have been used by the procurement office to establish a basis for an exemption from the Cost Accounting Standards Clause as well as the requirement to submit cost or pricing data (per PL 87-653) relative to the petroleum products portion of the contract. It has been concluded recently that due to the uncertainties and fluctuations in the current market, the prices contained in the petroleum trade journals do not represent market prices within the context of ASPR 3-807.1(b). Therefore, prospective supplies are now required to furnish catalog-published-market prices equivalent to that required on DD Form 633-7 to enable the procuring activity to establish exemptions under PL 91-379 and PL 87-653.

Except as outlined in paragraph (ii) above, the Cost Accounting Standards Clause has not been included in any other negotiated contracts made by DFSC with Mobil or any other major oil companies due to DFSC's past practice of relying upon market information from petroleum trade journals on which to base a market exemption. Mobil's position in refusing to include the Cost Accounting Standards Clause is not unique among the major oil firms. The majority of the international oil companies with whom DFSC contracts have recently indicated formally or informally that they will not agree to the inclusion of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause in any negotiated contracts. To date, none has agreed to the inclusion of this clause. Some of these firms, Asiatic Petroleum Corporation, Gulf Oil and Exxon International, have responded to DFSC's requests for inclusion of the clause by referring to letters submitted to the Cost Accounting Standards Board in 1972 which outlined the impracticalities of complying with the Standards.

On the basis of the foregoing, it is in the best interests of the Government to issue a contract for the supply of these petroleum products to Mobil Oil Corporation without the Cost Accounting Standards Clauses as pertains to the product portion. The absence of the clause in previous contracts with Mobil has not been deleterious to the Government. In the instant case, cost or pricing data covering the service portion of the contract has been submitted and the proposed contractor has agreed to a modified Cost Accounting Standards Clause to be applicable to that data. Therefore, a waiver of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause is hereby requested for the products portion of the proposed contract; and deviation from paragraphs d and e is requested for application to the services portion of the contract.

Re Request for Interpretation concerning Department of Defense procurement requirements.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: This is in response to your request on behalf of the Department of Defense ("DoD"), for an interpretation concerning the interrelationship between Federal Energy Administration regulations and the statutes and regulations applicable to procurement activities of DoD.

FACTS

DoD has traditionally obtained its domestic fuel requirements through competitive bid procedures. Since the implementation of the Mandatory Petroleum Allocation Regulations (10 C.F.R. § 211.1 et. seq.), suppliers of fuel to DoD have been designated pursuant to those regulations, generally on the basis of 1972 supplier-purchaser relationships, without competitive bids.

This change in procurement methods has made DoD's current procurement activities subject to certain provisions of procurement statutes and regulations, which did not apply to competitive bid procedures.

DoD is required by the provisions of 31 U.S.C. § 200 to enter into a contract with each of its suppliers. Under the Truth in Negotiations Act (P.L. 87-653) (10 U.S.C. § 2306(f)), contractors are required to submit to DoD certified cost or pricing data for all negotiated contracts or modifications in excess of $100,000, unless a procurement is otherwise determined by the procuring agency to fall within one of the exceptions set forth therein.

In addition, section 719 of the Defense Production Act of 1950, as added by P.L. 91-379 (50 U.S.C. App. 2168) established the Cost Accounting Standards ("CAS") Board to promulgate uniform cost accounting standards for use by defense contractors. Among other things, the CAS Board requires of certain contractors the execution of a Cost Accounting Standards Board Disclosure Statement (Form CASB-DS-1) and acceptance by the contractor of the Cost Accounting Standards Clause set forth in 4 C.F.R. § 331.60, ASPR 7-104.83, unless excepted by the procuring agency or the CAS Board. Uniform cost accounting standards are applicable to all negotiated prime and subcontract material defense procurements in excess of $100,000.

The issue as to which an interpretation has been requested is whether the requirements of FEA regulations, promulgated pursuant to the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973 (P.L. 93-159), supersede the requirements of law and regulation applicable to DoD contractors, as outlined above.

INTERPRETATION

The basic principle that has been followed by FEA in interpreting the scope of its statutory authority, as reflected in its regulations, is that its regulations do not supersede any other provision of law or regulation, unless there is a clear inconsistency between the provisions at issue. In the case of an irreconcilable conflict, the FEA regulations would be regarded as the controlling authority, if that were necessary to insure attainment of the objectives of the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973.

In our view, there is no inconsistency between the requirements of law and regulation applicable to DoD procurement through non-competitive bid procedures, as outlined above, and the FEA allocation and price regulations.

The fact that suppliers are required to supply DoD pursuant to FEA allocation regulations does not preclude compliance with the statutory requirement that DoD enter into contracts with its suppliers. The FEA is aware that many of the details of supplier-purchaser relationships which are established by FEA traditionally been specified by private contracts. Where, as here, the Congress has seen fit to provide by law that contracts shall be entered into and that certain requirements shall be met with respect to such contracts, the FEA regulations should not be interpreted so as to interfere with that legislative determination, as long as the two requirements are not inconsistent.

Thus, the FEA would not regard the unwillingness of a supplier to enter into a contract containing terms and conditions required by the laws and regulations governing DoD procurement activities as justification for failure to comply with the allocation regulations. It appears that the requirements of both the laws and regulations governing DoD's procurement activities and the FEA regulations can be readily complied with; and that the refusal of a supplier to abide by the procurement requirements applicable to DoD would have the effect of frustrating the objectives of the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act and the regulations issued thereunder.

We note that the objective of the statutory and regulatory requirements applicable to DoD's procurement activities is apparently to insure that DoD does not pay disproportionately high prices for the products it purchases. We anticipate that the FEA price regulations, and the cost calculations required of refiners thereunder, would be of substantial assistance to the CAS Board in this regard, and FEA is willing to cooperate to the fullest extent possible with the CAS Board, to insure that the Board is fully aware of FEA regulations and procedures.

The fact that both FEA regulations and the requirements governing DoD procurement activities are directed toward similar objectives does not mean, however, that the FEA regulations must be treated as the exclusive means to this end. FEA allocation and price regulations are necessarily the only basis upon which supplier-purchaser relationships and a supplier's maximum lawful price may be determined. Nevertheless, just as private parties are generally free to negotiate privately for contractual terms that are not inconsistent with FEA regulations, private parties dealing with government agencies must be deemed to be subject to the statutes and regulations governing procurement by those agencies, subject only to the overall limitations imposed by the FEA regulations.

The FEA has promulgated a regulation which requires, generally, that:

"Suppliers will deal with purchasers of an allocated product according to normal business practices in effect during the base period . . . and no supplier may modify any normal business practice so as to result in the circumvention of any provision of this chapter" (10 C.F.R. § 210.62).

This regulation does not, however, serve to prevent all changes in business practices suppliers. Rather, it is a regulation which seeks to prevent any circumvention of FEA regulations which might otherwise be accomplished through altered business practices. Although the requirements of the law or regulation applicable to DoD's procurement activities outlined above would necessarily affect the "normal business practices" of DoD suppliers, that change would not result in circumvention of FEA regulations. Rather, it would simply be a result of the fact that suppliers were now subject to a different set of requirements because they are no longer supplying DoD through competitive bid procedures.

As provided by § 205.85(d) this interpretation may be rescinded or modified at any time. Any appeal of this interpretation must be filed with the FEA Office of Exceptions and Appeals pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 205.86, within 30 days from service of this interpretation.

Sincerely,

ROBERT E. MONTGOMERY, Jr.,
General Counsel.

FOOD FOR HUNGRY PEOPLE THAT OTHERWISE WOULD HAVE SPOILED

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, when the news is all too often of strife and bloodshed, it is refreshing and encouraging to learn of personal activities which provide assistance to the needy.

In my State of Missouri, such an activity has been called to my attention recently. It involved the sending of a large amount of food to the hungry in a South American country.

On November 25, Mr. George Pace, manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Hannibal, Mo., contacted my office concerning the possibility of the Hannibal community donating 10 tons of survival biscuits, stored in civil defense shelters there, to the hungry in other lands.

We checked with civil defense officials, learned the survival biscuits, a concentrated food, had been given to States and local governments across the Nation for use in emergencies, that within 2 or 3 years the stored food would be in danger of spoilage and that the use of the food is within the jurisdiction of the local government.

My office advised Mr. Pace of the status of this food. He contacted the city officials of Hannibal who in turn authorized the donation. A Hannibal company, Atlantic Building Systems, Inc., agreed to donate its services to transport the food to New Orleans, and the CARE organization took it aboard ship for transportation to Colombia, South America.

Mr. President, this community effort, triggered by the inquiry from Mr. Pace and other interested citizens in Hannibal, demonstrates the kind of people-to-people concern in America which helps many thousands of needy persons in this country and the world every day.

This action will be most meaningful to the hungry in Colombia, but it is the spirit of this holiday season of good will that is needed throughout the year among all the peoples of the world.

I appeal to you, Mr. President, to make available the 300-million pounds of food now stored in Civil Defense Shelters and destined to spoil unless you direct executive action to save it.

Respectfully,

HANNIBAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
GEORGE H. PACE, Manager

FOOD MAY ROT WHILE THE HUNGRY DIE
(By Andrew Wilson)

More than 100,000 tons of packaged food that could be used to feed the nation's or the world's hungry appear destined to rot in fallout shelters around the United States in the next few years, a Globe-Democrat investigation shows.

The food—high nutrient biscuits and canned carbohydrate supplements—was stockpiled mostly in 1962-64 and will be fit for human consumption for only two to four more years according to nutrition experts at CARE, an international voluntary relief agency.

And 1,500 tons of the food already have spoiled, according to the U.S. Defense Civil Preparedness Agency.

The government has not adhered to a policy of keeping fallout shelters amply stocked with food as a precaution against nuclear attack.

That policy was abandoned in the late 1960s, and Civil Preparedness has not only allowed but encouraged communities to donate the food stocks in their fallout shelters, officials at the agency said.

It is only because these foodstuffs, which are tinned, boxed, cartoned and crated—ready to ship and ready to eat—have greatly exceeded their originally anticipated shelf-life of five years that they haven't already been ripped open and fed to cattle or dumped into landfills, Civil Preparedness officials said.

The agency has been working with volunteer groups and agencies since 1970 to expedite the flow of the food—scattered in 99,000 locations around the country—to areas of the world faced with massive starvation.

The preparedness agency has stressed in its dealings with local communities that they own and control the food in their shelters and can donate their stocks through relief agencies to needy areas.

The President,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PRESIDENT FORD: You are, according to several press releases, searching for food supplies to assist other nations.

Perhaps you will be interested to know that Hannibal, Missouri, this week is shipping approximately 10 tons of Civil Defense Food stores to Columbia, South America. There are, according to the Defense Department, an additional 150,000 tons of these Civil Defense food stores located in communities throughout the United States.

The Civil Defense food is nutritional, packaged and ready for shipment. The food will soon be inedible as, in most cases, it has been in storage for more than a decade.

I respectfully suggest that you utilize these available, and soon to perish food stuffs. The food may well serve to alleviate the serious hunger problems in our nation and in our world.

It is my humble judgment that should you, or any high-ranking governmental official, issue an appeal to the many communities having title to these food stocks, the food would quickly be made available for collection and transportation to any destination that you may designate.

I appeal to you, Mr. President, to make available the 300-million pounds of food now stored in Civil Defense Shelters and destined to spoil unless you direct executive action to save it.

Respectfully,

HANNIBAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
GEORGE H. PACE, Manager

DECEMBER 13, 1974.

"We'd sure rather see people eat this than have it fed to hogs, that's for certain," James J. Burns, directors of the financial and material assistance division of Civil Preparedness, said.

But the sum of a larger number of largely voluntary efforts—with little support of public money—has been a small dent in the total fallout shelter food supplies, he said. Only 13,500 tons—or 8 percent of the stockpile of 165,000 tons—have been distributed, agency records show.

The remaining 150,000 tons of still edible and highly nutritious food could feed 10 million people for 60 days, according to government sources.

STORED FOOD COULD HELP HUNGER

At present rates of distribution and anticipated spoilage, this means that 136,500 tons could go to waste in the next four years, the preparedness agency said.

"Some people don't want to give up their stocks. They ask what happens when a big boom comes," a Civil Preparedness official said.

But the much bigger problem in getting the food to needy people has been money, coupled with logistics and a lack of awareness among leaders of many communities that they are sitting atop small mountains of desperately needed food, experts said.

"The basic need is for somebody to put two and two together and allocate X millions of dollars for trucking these supplies," Burns said.

Even allowing for the logistical problems of gathering the stores from 99,000 locations around the country, "it's still cheaper to move a ton of this than several tons of wheat," a Civil Preparedness official said. Under the current setup, the U.S. government, through the Agency for International Development, a branch of the State Department, pays the ocean freight on food shipments.

Getting the food from inland cities to ports has been left largely to the private resources of citizen volunteer groups and voluntary relief agencies, Burns pointed out.

Agencies like CARE (Cooperative for American Relief Everywhere) inform Civil Preparedness of their ability to program certain tonnage needs for food in stricken lands.

Civil Preparedness then "sounds the alarm" for local civil defense directors to see whether their communities want to donate from their stocks, Burns said.

The problems in this approach were illustrated when the city of Hannibal, Mo., voted recently to give its entire stock of 10 tons from 16 shelters to hungry people anywhere in the world.

For starters, the town fathers were perplexed: Did they even have the right to donate the food? Where should it go? How could it be shipped?

"I thought, literally, that almost everybody in the country had forgotten this food," said George Pace, manager of the local Chamber of Commerce, who spearheaded the drive.

Pace was surprised to learn from a reporter that a mechanism already existed for donations of the food.

Now Hannibal has found a firm—Atlantic Building Systems, Inc., of Hannibal—which has volunteered to take the stores in its trucks to New Orleans. CARE will ship them to Colombia, Pace said.

The National Guard is assembling the food locally, Pace said.

In other inland cities it has taken the same sort of spirited efforts of private citizens and groups to move the food, Louis Samla, deputy executive director of CARE, reported.

Because Care's own resources are limited, it must rely on local inland communities to provide at least some assistance for the trucking and labor to get their stores to port cities, he said.

The problems of getting that kind of effort have meant that most big food donations have been assembled in the first place from port cities like New York, he said.

Sam Louis, director of the Office of Disaster Operations in the city of St. Louis, said it had dispensed roughly 15,000 pounds of food in the last 18 months to the Salvation Army, hurricane- and flood-stricken Honduras and other places.

Samla said he strongly favors some sort of federal-local matching grant system to facilitate movements of the food from inland cities.

"I don't know how much awareness there is in government structures that these commodities are there," he said.

Before the recent World Food Conference in Rome, Earl L. Butz, U.S. secretary of agriculture, warned hungry nations not to expect "a whole basketful of goodies" from the United States.

"Our capacity to deliver (food) this year is limited—let's face it," Butz said.

In a story carried in The Globe-Democrat this Wednesday, Norman E. Borlaug, winner of the 1970 Nobel Peace prize, predicted that millions will die from hunger in countries like India and Bangladesh in the next eight to nine months.

Borlaug, who won the prize for work in developing new strains of high-yield wheat to help poor countries feed their inhabitants, said:

"The deaths in those countries are going to make the fatalities from starvation caused by drought in the Sahara lands over the last couple of years look like very small numbers."

There is no official count of the number of deaths in the Sahara lands, but unofficial estimates have put it in the tens of thousands.

THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, the eminent Yugoslav writer, Mihajlo Mihajlov, is locked in conflict with his government. The issue is human rights, specifically, the right of freedom of expression. This is a right we call inalienable, a right we take for granted. Yet, in many parts of the world this is a right for which men still suffer and die.

The normally progressive and liberal government of Yugoslavia has, apparently, decided to try Mr. Mihajlov in secret; and he faces a long prison term for the crime of allowing his works to be published in the United States.

A number of American universities have invited Mr. Mihajlov to emigrate to the United States where he has been offered teaching positions. His government has interdicted any such move. They also will not allow his works to be published in Yugoslavia. Thus, besides denying his right of expression, they have denied him the means of earning a livelihood.

The United States cannot dictate the internal policies of sovereign nations. It can, however, exhort those governments to conform to what is implied in the United Nations Charter as well as the international consensus that is coalescing around the core value of human dignity.

The Yugoslav Government cannot be harmed by a lone individual—if it can, there is little there worth saving. Governments must learn not to overreact to criticism. It is criticism that will, if unfettered, allow us to progress. This is true whether the system is capitalist or socialist.

I urge the Yugoslav Government to reconsider its treatment of Mihajlo Mihajlov. I ask the Government to allow him to continue his work in Yugoslavia—if that is not acceptable, then he should be granted the right of egress. I hope the Yugoslavian leaders will come to the realization that it should not be criminal for an individual to express his views, that they will come to recognize the positive elements of criticism and of dialog.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter written to the Washington Post on the subject of Mr. Mihajlov's plight, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—"JUST ANOTHER POLICE STATE"

Yugoslavia, that "benevolent" Communist state which has received such praise for successfully opposing Soviet domination, now provides us with stunning evidence that it is just another police state wherein human freedoms are brutally trampled upon.

The case in point: the brilliant Yugoslav writer, Mihajlo Mihajlov, who at this moment either undergoing or facing a highly secret trial for daring to express his thoughts in books and newspaper articles—admittedly critical of that same Yugoslav police state. Constantly refused an outlet for his expression in his native country, Mihajlov's penetrating writings have been published from time to time in the United States by such organs as the New York Times, the New York Leader, etc. For this Mihajlov faces another long term in prison.

If he survives this new prison term (his other years of incarceration were mind and soul sapping), the Yugoslav government will undoubtedly continue its cruel policy of harassing this tormented individual. He had been continually denied means of employment in his native country. While he has been offered positions as guest lecturer by several major American college and universities, the Yugoslav government adamantly refuses to allow him to leave the country.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX DECREASE RECOMMENDED

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I believe the United States faces a real and growing threat of depression. I therefore, intend to support a 1-year, $12 billion personal income tax decrease as a priority matter for 1975.

In light of the events of recent days, the escalating layoffs, uniformly depressing economic indicators, and growing consumer wariness, it is obvious that strong medicine is needed, and needed soon. In testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Charles Schultze said that "a large part of the necessary stimulus must come from a tax cut." Mr. Schultze added that he believed the tax cut ought to be temporary in nature and that its benefits ought to be concentrated among poor and middle income Americans. I agree.

An across-the-board individual income tax decrease is the only strong anti-recession measure which has the public support necessary to assure rapid approval. Major increases in Government outlays could obviously achieve the same effect as a tax cut. But, in my opinion, public support for major new Government expenditures is not there, and enactment of these measures would thus be delayed. We need action soon, and only a tax cut can get that action.

I am aware that a tax cut could have some adverse effect on the effort to curb inflation. I believe this is a risk we must take. If this adverse effect does develop, then I would urge support for wage and price controls as needed to limit inflation while the tax cut is in effect.

I have supported a major overhaul of our income tax system since the day I came to Congress in 1970.

I am optimistic that next year will be the year that we are finally able to achieve meaningful tax reform. Nevertheless, I believe the economic situation to be so grave that I would support a simple tax cut for individuals if that is the only way to insure rapid adoption of this needed legislation. However, I do not believe there is any justification for any decrease in corporate income taxes and I hope that this body will not adopt such an approach.

Mr. President, the kind of economic figures we are looking at today are no laughing matter. What we are seeing is not a minor swing in the business cycle. It is a full scale recession which threatens to become a mini-depression or worse. A tax decrease adequate to fight the kind of recession that is developing would have to total at least $12 billion and must put at least $200 in additional spending money in the pocket of the average middle income American during 1975. That is the kind of tax decrease that I support. That is the kind of tax decrease that this country needs and needs early next year. I believe the Members of this Congress will learn from their constituents over the holidays, if they do not already know, that a tax cut to stimulate the economy must be at the very top of the agenda as the 94th Congress opens. I can assure you that it will be at the top of my own agenda.

A REPORT FROM THE LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, when Richard W. Velde was sworn in as Administrator of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration 3 months ago, he indicated that he was going to focus a great deal of attention on certain priority items. He also said that he would report periodically on the progress that the agency was making in reaching the goals which he established. Last week,

Mr. Velde gave his first report on the status of his priorities for improving the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration's effectiveness. I feel that this report would be of interest to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that Mr. Velde's statement be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY RICHARD W. VELDE, ADMINISTRATOR, THE LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE ADMINISTRATION, MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1974, WASHINGTON, D.C.

I am reporting to you today on the status of my priorities for improving the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration's effectiveness in supporting state and local criminal justice improvements.

Three months ago I met with you and told you what goals I had set for myself as the new LEAA Administrator. I promised you that I would meet with you periodically to describe the Agency's progress in meeting those goals or to answer for whatever shortcomings that might exist. This is my first meeting for that purpose.

LEAA is involved in an exceedingly broad range of complex activities, so there have been problems during the past three months as well as substantial forward movement. However, to generalize, it is fair to say that LEAA is responding to the challenges of its various responsibilities and is making major efforts to improve the quality of its work.

Reforming human institutions is an arduous undertaking. Especially in law enforcement and criminal justice there are no easy solutions to our society's centuries-old weaknesses. Therefore, I am not here to tell you tales of incredible successes which you would not believe. But what I can do is assure you that I and LEAA take seriously the mandate we have received from the Congress to work on each criminal justice problem with the utmost dedication and energy.

My priority statement last September listed 16 topics that I had designated as especially significant to LEAA's mission. What follows is a short summary of where the Agency stands on those matters today:

1—The block grant mandate. The pace of planning grant applications and approvals has increased compared to previous years. Fifty of the 55 states and territories have already sent in their applications. Twenty have already been approved, and 30 more are expected to be approved before the end of the month. By January 1 it is expected that 36 states and territories will have sent LEAA their annual criminal justice improvement plans. LEAA is revising the basic guidelines for planning and block action grants to allow for the publication of the fiscal year 1975 guidelines by March 1, 1975. This will facilitate the submission of state plans by September 30, 1975. The goal is to accelerate the guidelines and plan submission process so that all fiscal year 1977 plans can be submitted by October 1, 1976, the first day of the fiscal year. New initiatives to enhance the enforcement of the civil rights compliance obligations of state and local recipients of LEAA funds have begun. I am convening a policy development seminar next February to consider and recommend ways in which LEAA's civil rights compliance program can be strengthened. The Agency recently issued a comprehensive manual to help state and local governments prepare the equal employment opportunity programs LEAA requires. New training sessions in civil rights compliance matters will be conducted during the first half of 1975. I and other LEAA Administration officials have had numerous meetings with Governors as well as state, county, and municipal criminal justice officials. LEAA is currently reviewing the experience of the last five years, and next spring it will recommend to the President new proposals for criminal justice improvement legislation.

2—Corrections. LEAA supports the National Institute of Corrections and provides assistance to state and local agencies in legal services development, employment, and inmate training and education. It has expanded the clearinghouse functions at the University of Illinois. After having written guidelines for adult corrections, police, and courts, the clearinghouse is now establishing proposed guidelines for juvenile corrections. It has added corrections specialist positions in all LEAA regional offices. LEAA's Treatment Alternatives to Street Crime program continues to expand. The number of offenders referred to treatment programs has increased by 3,500 persons since July 1. The program is now serving Federal probationers and parolees. It is expected that the program will extend its treatment services and juvenile drug abusers. LEAA is supporting the AFL-CIO program to provide job placement and job training services to ex-offenders. Another significant program is the $1.8 million grant to Georgia's Department of offender rehabilitation to run restitution centers that will help offenders earn money to pay restitution to crime victims.

3—Juvenile delinquency. The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 established a new office within LEAA. I have established a task force to coordinate all prior juvenile justice and to plan the office's activities and priorities for the next two years. This group has prepared a workplan that emphasizes reducing the number of juvenile status offenders—that is, non-criminal youths—incarcerated in institutions. The plan also calls for community-based alternatives to incarceration. LEAA has requested the Congress to authorize it to reprogram block funds the states return to LEAA. The funds will be used for the initial support of the increased responsibilities under the Act. I have sent to the President the names of nominees for the National Institute of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Advisory Committee. These appointments are expected to be made shortly. Diverting juveniles from criminal activity as well as addressing the serious problems posed by young people who commit crime have been major LEAA priorities ever since the inception of Agency operations. This fiscal year several million dollars have been spent on such projects. LEAA has been meeting with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to insure an orderly transfer of its juvenile program activities and to explore ways by which the substantial resources of HEW, as well as other Federal agencies, can best be applied to youth development.

4—Courts. LEAA emphasizes prompt adjudication. The National Center for State Courts, which the Agency has supported with more than $2.4 million this quarter, conducts significant research into the question of court delay, particularly delay and other problems facing appellate courts. LEAA has begun testing one proposed solution in its Arizona Appellate Initiative project. It has started a model project in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals to provide increased resources for prompt adjudication. Many judges and other courts personnel—a substantial percentage of all such personnel in the nation—have been provided training and continuing education. LEAA is expanding its automated legal research program. LEAA funds have provided technical assistance services to more than 600 criminal justice agencies to improve their courts management and administration. The Agency is developing at the President's request a program to speed up the prosecution of defendants who have previously frequently been involved in homicides, forcible sexual offenses, aggravated assaults, robberies, or burglaries. LEAA provides nationwide continuing professional education courses in Law, trial skills, and administration for judges, district attorneys, police, and public and private defenders. One example is the grant to the National Defenders College for $583,000 awarded in October that will support the National College of Criminal Defense Lawyers and Public Defenders for one year.

5—Law enforcement. LEAA has awarded the Los Angeles Police Department a $450,000 grant to create nationwide standards for police executives. I attended the first project meeting. It is an especially important step in professionalizing law enforcement leadership careers. LEAA has begun a project to automate command and control and data subsystems in police patrol cars. Just a few days ago I signed a grant to Los Angeles to support the first stage of a program to redesign the city's emergency communications network. LEAA's National Institute is supporting a project to plan and demonstrate proposed modifications to police vehicles using available equipment that can increase economy, safety, and utility.

6—Organized crime. LEAA has made a thorough review of all organized crime programs to place a greater emphasis on the efficient management of this important Agency activity. LEAA and the National Association of Attorneys General co-sponsored an Organized Crime Prevention Council in Indianapolis last October. Tentative plans are being made for a National Organized Crime Conference next summer. Negotiations with the Cornell University Law School to institutionalize organized crime prosecutorial training will begin Wednesday.

7—Research and development. Evaluation is one of LEAA's highest priorities. The responsibility for developing and coordinating evaluation efforts rests largely with the Agency's National Institute. During the past three months, the Institute has continued its efforts to create a framework for a comprehensive criminal justice evaluation effort. Through its Office of Evaluation, the Institute has launched a $2 million Model Evaluation Program that will develop model systems at the state or regional level. Studies of the evaluation and monitoring systems currently existing at the state and local level have been completed. A report on monitoring systems has been published and distributed to the states. The evaluation systems report will be published next month. The Institute is supporting a number of projects that promise to increase knowledge about which criminal justice programs are the most effective. Under the National Evaluation Program, the Institute hopes to provide relatively rapid answers to questions about the benefits, problems, and costs of a number of widely used crime control efforts. The program will assess neighborhood team policing, specialized patrol operations, traditional preventive patrol, crime analysis units, pre-trial screening of cases, Treatment Alternatives to Street Crime, and early-warning robbery reduction projects. LEAA has published guidelines for State Planning Agency evaluation of block grant programs. Evaluation policies and procedures for discretionary grants soon will be published. The Law Enforcement Standards Laboratory provides criminal justice agencies with equipment information. Since July, nine standards have been published for such items as fixed and base station FM transmitters, personal portable FM transmitters, burglary alarm systems, walk-through metal detectors for use in weapons detection, and handcuffs. LEAA's technology transfer programs help state and local governments use promising research findings and innovative practices.

8—Standards and goals. The six standards and goals volumes have been analyzed, and the results are scheduled to be published by January. In addition, task forces to prepare standards and goals for civil disorders and terrorism, juvenile delinquency, research and development, and organized crime are being established. Virtually all states have begun to plan a standards and goals development process. Thirty-four states are in the development stage. Seventeen states have held statewide conferences, 10 have conducted public hearings, and 24 have held state-regional meetings.

9—Systems development and statistics. Last month LEAA published its first nationwide crime victim survey, Criminal Victimization in the United States, January-June 1973. The National Law Enforcement Telecommunications system configuration program has been completed. The system's users' guide has been updated, and high-speed data capacity has been provided to 20 states. LEAA is investigating other ways to expand the system within the criminal justice community. One active project is computer-aided legal research. The responsibility for data processing support for the Interstate Organized Crime Index has been transferred from the Michigan State Police to the California Department of Justice. A problem is that the Interstate Organized Crime Index and the security and privacy program have been delayed pending the approval of Department of Justice security and privacy regulations and legislation.

10—The Law Enforcement Education Program. A Law Enforcement Education Program Training Office will be established in January. A survey of the existing and future personnel needs of the criminal justice system is being conducted. It will determine the kinds of specialized training required for a variety of key positions, including patrolman, detective, parole officer, forensic scientist, and other positions. A manpower survey is being performed. LEEP currently supports 100,000 students in 1,000 schools with approximately $40 million annually. An extensive backlog in prior-year paperwork has been eliminated. Manual systems for processing paperwork and correspondence are in place awaiting the implementation of automated systems currently being developed.

11—Civil disorder and terrorism. LEAA will soon convene a task force under the chairmanship of Jerry Wilson, former Chief of Police, Washington, D.C. Nominations for members of the task force are being solicited. Members of previous civil disorder task forces are also being consulted. The task force will soon begin drafting national standards and goals for state and local programs. An LEAA-funded symposium on terrorism associated with the American Bicentennial Celebration will be conducted by the FBI for 100 state and local police executives December 10 through 12. LEAA's Private Security Advisory Council has established a Committee on the Prevention of Terrorist Crimes. Its members include law enforcement and private security officials as well as representatives from other Federal agencies.

12—International authority. LEAA is establishing assistance programs for other Federal agencies and international organizations to control airplane hijacking, narcotics smuggling, and terrorism. Two projects are included, and both are on schedule. The United Nations Social Defense Research Institute Clearinghouse project is in the eighth month of a 12-month developmental effort. One interesting international study on the worldwide energy crisis and its impact has revealed that the three-day workweek in Great Britain and the automobileless Sundays in the Netherlands did not prompt significant increases in crime rates.

13—Fiscal integrity and public accountability. The LEAA accounting system is being updated. Data processing programs are producing all grant reports. Twenty-five financial reports have been distributed since June 1974. An additional 35 financial reports will be produced during January 1975. A grants data base, consisting of approximately 15,000 transactions representing fiscal years 1969 through 1974 has been established. The necessary data elements for the preparation of management reports and the analysis of financial information have been developed. The Office of Inspector General has issued 93 audit reports and seven regional office inspection reports and has closed 23 investigations. It has completed one basic auditor training course and two advanced auditor training courses. In addition, it has conducted a one-day program on fraud and other criminal activities at the Pennsylvania State Planning Agency and held a one-day auditor training seminar for State Planning Agency auditors in LEAA Boston region.

14—Internal administration. Management Briefs, a monthly report of key LEAA financial and administrative activity, has been published each month since July. Monthly management reviews started in October. They discuss the Agency's management-by-objectives progress. LEAA's Grants Management Information System has been expanded to include state comprehensive plans and discretionary grant monitoring. A centralized grant processing and administration function has been established to ensure the expeditious processing of grant applications.

15—Employee relations and development. A training program for all new employees is being developed. It will incorporate lectures and videotape shows supplemented by a comprehensive handbook covering the history, organization, and future of LEAA. A high priority has been given to training LEAA's top managers. Twenty of the twenty-three individuals in executive positions have either participated in or have been enrolled in appropriate managerial training programs. More than 200 Agency employees have participated in or will soon take special instruction. Ten LEAA employees have already taken advantage of my open-door policy and have come in to talk to me privately about Agency matters. A revised code of ethics is about to be approved. Medical examinations are being extended to all LEAA personnel. A physical fitness program is being developed. An Agency arts and crafts exhibit will be held in late February. The competition will be open to all LEAA employees and their dependents and will include separate categories for professionals and amateurs and for juniors and children in painting, photography, metal work, wood carving, and weaving.

16—Relationships with the Congress. I have met with Members of the Congress and congressional committee staff personnel to discuss the status of LEAA programs and, particularly, to share information about its progress in preparing to implement the new Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974. Moreover, a steady flow of communications has been developed between LEAA and the congressional oversight committees. Additional sessions for Members of the Congress are planned, and LEAA is developing an effort to familiarize new Members of the Congress with the LEAA program.

THE DEPARTURE OF POWELL MOORE FROM THE WHITE HOUSE STAFF

veteran of Federal service, will leave the White House staff after the first of the year to enter private business, and I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate Powell for a job well done.

In some 10 years of Government service, Mr. Moore has compiled a very fine record. He was press secretary to the late Senator Richard B. Russell of Georgia for 4½ years and, following Dick Russell's death in 1971, he served as a press officer in the Department of Justice. He has been at the White House for the past 2 years as a legislative liaison officer, working as a Deputy Special Assistant to the President in the office of Bill Timmons.

Powell has been an able and conscientious public servant and I wish him well and every success in his new undertaking in the private sector.

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I was pleased to join my colleagues in support of the conference report we approved yesterday on H.R. 17468, the military construction appropriations bill for fiscal year 1975.

As a member of the conference committee which deliberated on the final form of this measure, I want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to my fellow conferees from both the House and Senate for their statesmanship and willingness to compromise responsibly, which allowed us to reach agreement on several difficult and keenly disputed items.

I would like particularly to underscore the agreement we reached on the matter of appropriations for Naval District, Washington, D.C., and the related question of various proposals to move existing Naval installations out of the Washington metropolitan area.

My colleagues will recall that some Members of the House of Representatives have held the view that long-established naval missions should be moved out of the National Capital area simply because there are too many here, and the original report of the House committee on this bill reflected that view.

In addressing this question, our report of the Senate Appropriations Committee took a different view, and one with which I strongly concur. In our report, we stated:

The Committee does not support relocation merely for the purpose of decreasing activity in the Washington metropolitan area The Committee is opposed to relocations and the disruption of community life simply for convenience sake and in the absence of a concrete showing of economy and efficiency.

I am heartened to note that the report of the conference committee reflects this view that the transfers of naval missions should be considered only insofar as they can be justified on the basis of economy and efficiency, and not simply on the basis of an allegedly excessive concentration of installations in any one area. In this connection, the conferees have instructed the Navy to come back to Congress next year with a comprehensive plan outlining which missions, if any, are "logical candidates for movement, taking into consideration economies and the overall efficiency of the naval service."

On this basis, I am confident that the temptation to juggle our naval installations like musical chairs will be resisted, and that a sound, logical, and thoughtful process will confirm what I have long believed: that the stability and efficiency which result from maintaining existing installations, particularly where great sums have already been invested, should not be haphazardly sacrificed to the urge to decentralize in the absence of most compelling reasons.

For example, the Department of the Navy is currently considering a proposal that will result in the relocation of the approximately 1,700 employees of the Naval Oceanographic Office, which is presently situated in Suitland, Md. According to unofficial estimates, the proposed move will cost the Navy at least $12 million and might be as costly as $25 million. Since mid-August, I have attempted to secure from the Navy a statement on the cost-effectiveness of the various proposals currently under consideration. I understand that one of the plans being studied will relocate the Oceanographic Office to Bay St. Louis, Miss. In any event, I have yet to receive any documentation which adequately justifies the expense or the benefit to be accrued by the Navy as a result of any relocation proposal.

In addition to the problem of cost-effectiveness, I am deeply troubled by the question of how much more efficient the operation of the Naval Oceanographic Office will become as a result of any move which will take it outside of the Washington area. I understand that the personnel at NAVOCEANO maintain very close liaison with such "sister agencies" as the Naval Weapons Lab, the Naval Research Lab, the Naval Ordnance Lab, the Defense Mapping Agency, the Pentagon, and NOAA, on both formal and informal bases, and that such contact is vital to the missions of all of these agencies. I sincerely doubt that the removal of the Naval Oceanographic Office will accrue to the benefit of the operations of these organizations, particularly if their interrelationships and interdependencies were to be destroyed.

Perhaps in this particular case, the most desirable alternative, as far as overall naval efficiency goes, might be to consolidate functions rather than to disperse them; and I have suggested that a new building could be easily constructed on existing property in Suitland, where there is ample room. Such a new facility would cost the Department of the Navy less than half the amount that a move of the entire operation to Louisiana would cost.

In any event, in cases such as the one involving the Naval Oceanographic Office, I feel very strongly that adequate review and thorough cost justification, "taking into consideration economies and the overall efficiency of the naval service," must be made, and any such proposals must be carefully weighed and considered before disruption of vast numbers of Federal employees is to take place. As long as I am a member of the Senate and the Committee on Appropriations, my colleagues may be sure that I will not stand idly by while the Pentagon plans to uproot my constituents, waste taxpayers' money and disturb the stability of existing agencies merely for the sake of decentralization or convenience and not without a concrete showing of economy and efficiency.

OUR NATIONAL HERITAGE

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, like a number of my colleagues in the Senate, I have video tape recorded a "Bicentennial Minute" as part of a continuing series by the Columbia Broadcasting System.

I believe this series make a valuable contribution by calling attention to the 200th anniversary of our birth as a nation and by reminding viewers of our national heritage.

I ask unanimous consent that the script of my "Bicentennial Minute," to be broadcast January 17, 1975, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the script was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is Senator John Tunney of California. Two hundred years ago today, Benjamin Franklin spent a rare, non-political evening with friends in London.

There was a dinner party to mark his 69th birthday.

Franklin was in London as an American agent, negotiating and politicking on behalf of the colonies.

They were tense times for Franklin. In December he'd submitted the colonists' grievances to the King and debate on the petition was only days away.

Franklin wasn't hopeful that a political settlement would be reached. He suspected that Britain planned to use force in dealing with the Americans.

On March 21st, Dr. Franklin sailed for home. He was now convinced that war was certain. He was right. The "shot heard 'round the world" was fired at Lexington on April 19 while he was still at sea.

I'm Senator Tunney and that's the way it was.

THE 80TH BIRTHDAY OF HENRY HAZLITT

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, the great economist, Henry Hazlitt, celebrated his 80th birthday on November 28. This great champion of human dignity was once described by H. L. Mencken as "the only economist that could be understood by the general public."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the November 30 issue of Human Events in which Mr. Hazlitt's close friend, Murray Rothbard, honors him.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

It is indeed a pleasure to have the opportunity to honor Henry Hazlitt on his 80th birthday (November 28). One of the most distinguished and productive economists, writers and intellectuals in this country, Hazlitt at 80 looks and acts a full 20 years younger. A remarkable combination of a brilliant and incisive mind, an unusually clear and lucid style, and an unfailingly cheerful, generous, and gentle soul, Henry Hazlitt continues to be a veritable fount of energy and productivity.

No one, moreover, can match Henry Hazlitt in blending great and broad erudition with a clarity and simplicity of style that makes him a joy to read. The great stylist H. L. Mencken's tribute to Hazlitt 40 years ago that he was the only economist that could be understood by the general public remains true to this day.

Why, then, does Henry Hazlitt remain grievously neglected by the nation's intellectuals, by the self-proclaimed intellectual elite that moulds so much of "educated" public opinion? Why does Hazlitt, for example, never appear, either as writer or reviewed author, in the highly influential New York Review of Books?

There are several factors that contribute to this shameful neglect of one of the country's outstanding writers and thinkers. They all add up to his being totally out of the intellectual fashion of our day.

In the first place, he lacks either a Ph. D. or an academic post—those twin passports to intellectual and academic respectability. For a scholar to discuss or footnote a book by Hazlitt—no matter how important or scholarly—would be to lose caste and Brownie points in the status-anxious world of academe.

Secondly, in an age of hyper-specialization, when the fashion is to aspire to be the world's foremost expert on some extremely narrow and trivial topic, Henry Hazlitt simply knows too darn much about an enormous range and variety of subjects. Surely, then, he must be unsound.

Thirdly, Hazlitt writes too clearly; surely, someone who writes so that he can be generally understood lacks the "profundity" that only obscurantist jargon can provide. One of the main reasons for the popularity of Karl Marx and John Maynard Keynes among intellectuals was precisely the staggering obscurity of their prose; only when a writer is obscure can a cult of followers gather around to serve as the semi-official interpreters and exegetes of the Master. Henry Hazlitt has always lacked that fog of incomprehensibility necessary to become celebrated as a Profound Thinker.

Fourthly, as an economist, Hazlitt has always been too honest to don the robes of soothsayer and prophet, to tell us precisely what the GNP or the unemployment rate is going to be in six or nine months.

Last but certainly not least, Henry Hazlitt has been totally outside the modern fashion in battling for many years as an uncompromising adherent of laissez-faire and the free market economy. If only Hazlitt had been a statist or Socialist, perhaps he would have been forgiven for his other intellectual sins. But not the greatest sin of all—of arguing, year in and out, for free-market capitalism.

In the course of his remarkably productive career, Henry Hazlitt has been distinguished as a journalist, editor, literary critic, philosopher, political scientist and, above all, economist. His major base has been in journalism.

Born in Philadelphia in 1894, young Hazlitt left college early to be a financial writer, successfully for the Wall Street Journal, the New York Evening Post, and the Mechanics and Metals National Bank of New York. In 1921 he became financial editor for the New York Evening Mail. Then, during the 1920s, he expanded his horizons into the general editorial and literary fields, first as editorial writer for the New York Herald and the New York Sun, and then as literary editor for the Sun in the late 1920s, from which he went to the Nation as literary editor from 1930 to 1933. When H. L. Mencken left the editorship of the American Mercury in 1933, he was happy to select Hazlitt as his successor to that distinguished post.

After leaving the Mercury the following year, Hazlitt became an editorial writer for—mirabile dictu—the New York Times for the next dozen years. It was Hazlitt who largely accounted for whatever conservative tone the Times adopted during that era.

It was shortly after he joined the Times that an event occurred which would change and shape Hazlitt's life from that point on. Reviewing the first English translation of Ludwig von Mises' great work Socialism in 1936, Hazlitt was converted to a position of uncompromising adherence to free-market capitalism, and hostility to statism and socialism that would mark all of his work from that time forward.

Hazlitt became a leading follower of the great Austrian, free-market economist, and was to become one of Mises' closest friends and co-workers from the time that Mises emigrated to the United States during World War II.

It was as a leading "Misesian" that Hazlitt was to write the bulk of his more than a dozen books and countless journal and newspaper articles.

As the New York Times moved inexorably leftward, Henry Hazlitt departed to become weekly economic columnist for Newsweek magazine. There, for 20 years, from 1946–1966, Hazlitt, week in and week out, penned lucid and incisive defenses of the free market, private property rights, and the gold standard, as well as trenchant critiques of the evils of government intervention in the economy.

In countless radio and television debates, and on the lecture platform, Hazlitt carried on the battle against the growth of Big Government. Furthermore, he was co-editor-in-chief of the Freeman in its early years, 1950–53, when that magazine was a noble attempt to serve as a weekly periodical on behalf of the conservative-libertarian cause.

But it is his host of published books that will serve as an enduring monument to this great and much neglected man. The scope and merit are enormous: ranging from his first work on clear thinking, Thinking As A Science (1916, reissued in 1969), to literary criticism, The Anatomy of Criticism (1933).

Particularly important, both in quantity and quality, is his post-1936 or "Misesian" output. His first work in this period was a notable contribution to political science, A New Constitution Now (1942, and soon to be reissued; see HUMAN EVENTS, Nov. 16, 1974, page 10). This work, in which Hazlitt argued for the scrapping of the American Constitution on behalf of a European Parliamentary government, was not calculated to please Constitutionalist conservatives.

But whether or not one agrees fully with Hazlitt, he made an extremely important point which has taken on far more importance in these days of unbridled executive and presidential power. For he argued that the great defect of the American Constitution is that it permits runaway executive power, unchecked by Congress or the public.

A Parliamentary system could at least make the executive far more responsive to Congress, and serve as a check on executive tyranny. In the era of Watergate, there would have been no need for the clumsy impeachment process, since the President could have been removed far more easily and swiftly.

In 1946, Hazlitt published his most popular book, Economics in One Lesson, which remains to this day the best introductory primer to economic science. With his usual lucidity, Hazlitt set forth the merits of the free market, and the unfortunate consequences of all the major forms of government intervention, all of which continue to plague us today.

There is still no better introduction to free market economics than Economics in One Lesson. The "lesson" derives from the 19th Century libertarian French economist Frederic Bastiat, who was also distinguished for the clarity of his style: the difference between "what is seen" as a result of government intervention and "what is not seen."

For example, if the government taxes the public to build housing, what is seen is the new housing, which may seem on the surface to be a net advance; what is not seen is what the public would have done if they had been allowed to keep their own money.

The following year, Hazlitt came out with his booklet, Will Dollars Save the World?, his dissection of the Marshall Plan and one of the first important critiques of the postwar foreign aid program. This was followed by his Illusions of Point Four (1950), on Truman's boondoggle program of aid to what is now known as the "Third World."

In 1951, Hazlitt turned to the novel form, publishing what is one of my own favorite parts of the Hazlitt canon, The Great Idea (1951, later reissued as Time Will Run Back, 1966). The Great Idea was roasted by critics as a novel, but I confess I enjoyed it thoroughly, and it has long been one of my favorite works of fiction. This despite (or perhaps because of) the fact that it frankly cloaks sound economic theory in a readable, novelistic form.

For one thing, it is one of the best and most thorough discussions of the economic fallacies of socialism to be found anywhere. The plot is fascinating: by happenstance, an intelligent political innocent inherits the post of dictator of a future World Communist State.

Beginning simply as a search for ways of making the disastrous Communist economy work better, the dictator alters the economy, step by inexorable logical step, in the direction of freedom until he changes the world into a purely free market economy and free society.

Beginning with allowing citizens to exchange their ration tickets, the dictator comes to rediscover the forgotten free market, gold money, and the rights of private property. If the aesthetes are worried about the lack of avant-garde symbolism or of morbid psychologizing in The Great Idea, then so much the worse for them!

A few years later came a veritable labor of love, The Free Man's Library (1956). Hazlitt's annotated bibliography of libertarian and conservative books. It still serves as the only work of its kind, and an updating of this book would be one of the most useful projects to inspire and instruct a new generation of libertarians.

In 1959, Hazlitt published his greatest contribution to economic science, the massive, thorough Fallacies of the New Economics, a step-by-step and page-by-page evisceration of Lord Keynes' mischievous and enormously influential General Theory. Employing Misesian "Austrian" economics in a masterful fashion, Hazlitt left not a shred standing of Keynes' famous work. It was a superb exercise in economic demolition.

The massive neglect of Fallacies by the economics profession, which, when it deigned to consider the book at all, dismissed it as mere "pamphleteering," is a shameful blot on the state of the economics profession. As a one-two punch to Keynesianism, Hazlitt followed up this work by collecting the best anti-Keynesian critiques by economists in his The Critics of Keynesian Economics (1960).

In the same year, Hazlitt wrote his searching critique of the inflationary policies of our time, warning of accelerating inflation and calling for a return to the gold standard in his What You Should Know About Inflation (1960, revised editions in 1965 and 1968). Happily, Hazlitt is now busily at work on a new book on this all too timely topic.

Not content with economics, political science, journalism and literary criticism, Hazlitt next turned to an important work on political and ethical philosophy, The Foundations of Morality (1964). In a work fully as neglected by the academic philosophers as his economic writings were ignored by the nation's economists, Hazlitt argued for a utilitarian ethic and for the morality of free-market capitalism.

In his latest two books, Henry Hazlitt dealt with the vital problems of poverty and the welfare state: Man vs. the Welfare State (1970) and The Conquest of Poverty (1973). In these works, Hazlitt showed that only capitalism can conquer poverty and provide genuine welfare, and he demolished the fallacies of the welfare state.

Thus, throughout his remarkably productive life, Henry Hazlitt has fought for freedom and a free-market economy with a unique combination of the erudition of a scholar and the lucidity and popular appeal of a lifelong writer and journalist. In a healthier cultural and intellectual climate, he would have honors heaped upon him by scholars and by the general public. As it is, we can only do our part by greeting this vibrant and gracious gentleman, this distinguished scholar and libertarian, and by looking forward to the many important books and articles which will doubtless flow from his pen in the years to come.

THE NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS DEBATE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, for many years, many people looked to nuclear power as the energy source for the future. In the last few years, however, there has been increasing debate on both the potential and the safety of nuclear power. The energy shortages of last winter focused attention on the need to decrease their country's dependence on oil and gas—and, naturally, nuclear power has been one of the most-discussed alternatives. But the increased attention given to nuclear power also has intensified the national debate on whether or not nuclear powerplants are the answer—or even one of the answers—to the national energy dilemma.

In Iowa this year, the State legislature considered a bill to place a moratorium on construction of nuclear power plants in the State. The bill was rejected, but the issue is not dead.

The controversy is primarily about safety. Last August, the Atomic Energy Commission released the Rasmussen report which indicated that the chance of a disastrous accident at a nuclear powerplant is very small. A number of people and organizations have expressed their disagreement with the Rasmussen report. One of these organizations is the Iowa Student Public Interest Research Group—ISPIRG—a nonprofit, professionally staffed organization of about 10,000 Iowa students. The Rasmussen report is available to all the Members of the Senate. To help make the other side of the issue available, I ask unanimous consent that a brief criticism of the Rasmussen report, by Skip Laitner of ISPIRG, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SKIP LAITNER, ENVIRONMENTAL COORDINATOR, DISCUSSING THE ISPIRG REVIEW OF THE AEC'S "REACTOR SAFETY STUDY"

In August of this year the Atomic Energy Commission released, for comment, a draft copy of a nuclear reactor safety study. Popularly known as the Rasmussen Report, the study estimated the probability of a major nuclear accident in which as many as 2,300 people would be killed. Such an accident would occur with a probability of one chance in a billion.

ISPIRG was one of a number of groups invited to comment on this study. The bulk of our efforts and the source of 75% of our information sources used in this review came from the AEC's own regulatory studies. The conclusion of this latest study files in the face of the AEC's own experience and their previous publications. Our review of the Rasmussen Study indicates that this $3 million project is a promotional document designed to minimize the hazards of nuclear power and is nothing more than an expensive mathematical exercise.

Any figures used to determine nuclear risks are meaningless. Such computations depend upon the identification of an infinite number of variables for which, the AEC even admits, information is incomplete. For example, the AEC is only now beginning a series of tests to determine the behavior of nuclear fuel under critical operating circumstances. Continued research on the safety systems of nuclear reactors, most notably the emergency core cooling systems (ECCS), is not scheduled until sometime in 1975. This information is, therefore, totally incomplete and any risk estimates cannot be firmly established.

Specifically the deficiencies of the study include:

(1) a limited operating experience with commercial reactors and an inadequate data base from which risk assessment can be developed.

(2) the unjustifiable assumption that all significant paths which may lead to an accident have been identified. The history of nuclear operating experience indicates otherwise.

(3) the complete failure to discuss the effects of sabotage of nuclear facilities. In April of this year, Senator Abraham Ribicoff released a report for the AEC which stated, "in recent years the factors which make safeguards a real, imminent and vital issue have changed rapidly for the worse." Yet the AEC completely ignored this aspect in the discussion of reactor safety.

(4) An inadequate discussion of the frequency or consequences of human error. Although thousands of Americans, from people who soldered the circuits to computer programmers, felt personally responsible for the safety and success of the Apollo missions, two out of 17 missions failed and three astronauts died, not from outer-space surprises, but from simple human error.

In testimony before the Subcommittee on State Energy Policy in the California legislature, Mr. William Bryan, an expert in reliability and safety analysis who spent 11 years with the aerospace industry and was involved in the safety analysis of the Apollo and Nerva programs, stated that the study technique used by the AEC was useful in comparing alternative approaches in design. However, he noted, such results are not "meaningful in any absolute sense" and are subject to manipulation. Mr. Bryan concluded that the AEC is "pushing phony reliability and safety numbers" to establish the safety of nuclear power plants.

On September 22, 1974, a full month after the release of the Rasmussen report, Carl J. Hovevar, one of the AEC's top safety experts, quit his job in "order to be free to tell the American people the truth about the potentially dangerous conditions in the nation's nuclear power plants". In agreeing with reactor safety critics, Hovevar stated, in a letter to the AEC chairman, Dixy Lee Ray, that "the AEC is using shaky and unproven computer predictions as a basis for answering such vital questions as the effectiveness of reactor safety systems..." Hovevar also said that, "the AEC is ignoring advice from many of its experts on reactor safety problems, a situation that has given rise to numerous resignations."

Thus, the zeal for promoting nuclear power as the nation's leading energy source continues to overshadow the AEC's responsibility to resolve these serious questions about nuclear safety. The fact that the nuclear industry will not accept the financial responsibility for the consequences of a nuclear accident is continuous proof that the technology is not safe. On one hand we have engineers who insist that nuclear power is perfectly safe. On the other hand, attorneys and economists for the industry insist that a limitation on the liability be continued with the renewal of the Price-Anderson Act. This is an act which states that neither the industry nor the Federal government shall be liable for more than $560 million in damages, should an accident occur, despite the fact that the AEC's own estimate of damage potential exceeds 17 billion dollars.

If the nuclear industry believes the results of the Rasmussen report, then they do not need the protection of the Price-Anderson Act. However, as long as they continue to demand its existence, they cannot seriously expect anyone to believe the Rasmussen report. As Herbert S. Denenberg, the former insurance commissioner of Pennsylvania, recently wrote, "We can take the latest AEC study seriously when the insurance industry starts using it to set insurance rates."

In view of the existing doubts about the safety of nuclear power, ISPIRG must, therefore, renew its call for a moratorium on further construction of nuclear plants until such questions are fully and adequately resolved.

THE METHODIST HOSPITALS OF MEMPHIS, TENN.

Mr. BROCK, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that material on behalf of the Methodist Hospitals of Memphis, Tenn., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 6, 1974.

Hon. WILLIAM H. BROCK III,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BROCK: On November 26, I wrote you a hasty letter regarding adverse publicity that the Methodist Hospital had received. Enclosed is a more detailed account of our position in this instance, which we would sincerely appreciate your entering into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on behalf of the Methodist Hospital. We feel we must protect the good name of the Methodist Hospitals of Memphis. The charges made in the report of the Southern Governmental Monitoring Project of Atlanta, Georgia, to the Health Subcommittee chaired by Senator Ted Kennedy of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare are false.

If there is any cost for this service, please be assured we will be happy to reimburse you. It is our understanding that we have thirty days from the time charges were placed on November 25, to correct this error. We shall appreciate your acknowledging this request and confirming that it can be accomplished.

Sincerely yours,

C. HENRY HOTTUM,
Executive Director.

THE METHODIST HOSPITALS OF MEMPHIS POSITION STATEMENT

On Monday, November 25, Allen Crimm of the Southern Governmental Monitoring Project of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, Georgia, presented testimony before the Health Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Certain charges contained therein about the Methodist Hospitals in Memphis, Tennessee, are untrue; and we would like to correct the records.

Around July 1, 1974, a young man by the name of James C. Camp, came to my office—unnannounced and unidentified—and asked me if it were true that the Methodist Hospitals in Memphis, Tennessee, did not participate in the Medicaid Program. I stated that he was correct, but that we did render free service for the indigents and we frequently took patients that were Medicaid-eligible on our charity service under the care of the House Staff and forfeited filing a Medicaid claim. Our position was based on the fact that the Medicaid claim procedure is complex and costly. There is a limit of 20 days of coverage for any Medicaid-eligible patient in the State of Tennessee and there were insufficient appropriations in the programs in Tennessee to meet all the claims. We understood that the hospitals that did accept Medicaid frequently found themselves filing claims for which no funds were available.

Mr. Camp then asked what care was available to the Medicaid-eligible residents of Shelby County. I answered him that the majority of those patients went to the City of Memphis hospitals where governmental funds were provided for their care. Mr. Camp asked for financial information, at which time I asked him to identify himself and declare for whom he was gathering this information. I made a few estimates of some figures without referring to records to substantiate them. A few days later, he furnished me a letter requesting specific information (Exhibit I), and an identification of the firm for which he was working (Exhibit II). I replied on July 8, 1974 (Exhibit III). You will notice in that letter there was no reference to the disposition of residents of Shelby County.

On Saturday, November 23, a Memphis Press Scimitar reporter telephoned me and informed me that on Monday, November 25, testimony would be presented before the Subcommittee in Washington. I answered a few general questions, but gave him no specific figures. That afternoon, November 23, the Memphis Press Scimitar carried the story shown in Exhibit IV. I denied these charges locally, and a correctional story appeared in the press on November 26. (Exhibit V). I wrote Mr. Crimm on November 26, to protest the inaccuracy of his testimony (Exhibit VI).

According to Government regulations, we were to select one of four options as to how much free service we would do. The option that we selected was 10% of the amount of our Hill-Burton Grant received; or $105,699 per year. As the story substantiated, we are doing about 13 times as much as required of us and about one-half of the charity work that we do is for residents of Shelby County. If we were to consider Medicare and other contractual discounts, bad debts, etc., we would show that we are giving nearly $7,000,000 of free service per year. This is about 16% of our total patient income and we believe it is larger than the amount of free service given by most voluntary hospitals and it is a greater amount than required under new regulations.

We are church-owned and have been operating for over 50 years with a commitment of service, regardless of the patients' ability to pay.

We want the records corrected to reflect that we do render service to the indigents of Shelby County, Tennessee.

C. HENRY HOTTUM,
Executive Director.

DEAR SIR: Please find enclosed a description of the project. I hope this will be adequate. We feel that the information we are seeking is not of a confidential nature, and I have had nothing but cooperation from other facilities in the area. If you need further assurances, please contact my director, Mr. Wayne Clark, in Atlanta, 404-522-8764. I appreciate your time and consideration, and look forward to completing this survey as soon as possible.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

SOUTHERN GOVERNMENTAL MONITORING PROJECT

The Southern Governmental Monitoring Project is a special project of the Southern Regional Council. The Southern Regional Council, founded in 1944, is a research and information agency devoted to the attainment of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South.

The Southern Governmental Monitoring Project was established in 1973 by the Carnegie, Babcock, and Rockefeller Brothers foundations to investigate the effects of the "New Federalism" on minorities and the poor, and to assist community groups to understand and cope with government decentralization. For blacks and other minorities, and for those in poverty, New Federalism has serious implications: federal programs are being discontinued or reduced in funding, forcing states and localities to turn to federal revenue sharing funds or local monies if these programs are to be continued. The Southern Governmental Monitoring Project's purposes are to see how states, cities, and counties are responding and to help local groups understand and take advantage of these developments.

The Southern Governmental Monitoring Project has placed 50 interns in selected cities and towns in 11 southern states. During the 10 week period (mid-June to mid-August) interns will interview mayors, county officials, community leaders, and others to determine the effects of New Federalism on selected governmental activities in that area. They will aid community groups in their own investigations and, where possible, will assist groups in dealing with state and local governments. At the end of the summer the individual reports will be compiled and published.

Mr. JAMES C. CAMP,
Southern Governmental Monitoring Project
Memphis, Tenn.

DEAR MR. CAMP: As requested we are happy to furnish you with the following information. You will find the figures I gave you from memory are inaccurate; the following are the correct figures:

Operating Expenses:
1972	23,823,752
1973	30,855,169
Hill-Burton Grants were as follows:
School of Nursing	$950,000
Total	1,056,987

Notice of Services to Persons Unable to Pay:

Our first notice of services to persons unable to pay appeared in the Memphis Press-Scimitar on April 26, 1973. On May 8, 1973, we received a notice from the State of Tennessee, Department of Public Health, that we were in presumptive compliance.

The second notice was in the Memphis Press-Scimitar on April 4, 1974. On April 11, 1974 we received a notice from the State of Tennessee, Department of Public Health we were in compliance with the Hill-Burton charity care regulations.

Amount of Charity rendered to indigent patients:

Very truly yours,

Executive Director.

CHARGES AGAINST METHODIST HOSPITAL: "NOT MEETING FREE SERVICE OBLIGATION TO INDIGENTS"

(By Peggy Burch)

Methodist Hospital in Memphis is included in charges made by a government monitoring project that many Southern hospitals receiving federal funds are not meeting their obligation to provide free medical service to indigent patients.

Allan Crimm, of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, has prepared a report on the council's investigation in 25 cities in 11 Southern states to be presented to the health subcommittee of the U.S. Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Crimm's report states that "facilities throughout the South are still not meeting their legal obligation to provide free medical service."

Methodist Hospital received $1,056,987 under the Hill-Burton Medical Facilities Construction Act, according to the report, with an obligation to provide $105,699 in free service. Methodist applied for no Medicaid reimbursements for indigents, the report says.

C. Henry Hottum, executive director of Methodist, said today that the hospital does not apply for Medicaid funds because of "complexities in filing for the funds, and inadequate appropriations."

The report charges that Methodist limits its number of indigent patients by using geographical restrictions. Hottum is quoted as saying that indigent patients are not accepted from Shelby County because "they are the responsibility of the City of Memphis Hospital."

Hottum said the hospital "does not refuse indigent patients from Shelby County, but we put emphasis on out-of-county indigent patients because the City Hospital has government funds to treat Shelby County indigent patients."

Southern Regional Council, a non-profit organization established 30 years ago and based in Atlanta, began its monitoring project in 1973. Dr. Philip Caper, medical consultant to the Senate health subcommittee, invited the report by the monitoring project.

Crimm is expected to tell the subcommittee members Monday that project findings were:

That some facilities use "loopholes" to avoid accounting for specific free service dollar amounts.

That hospitals include "highly questionable expenses."

That public notification of free service for indigent patients is inadequate.

That patients eligible for free service are turned away because of "arbitrary" geographic or service limitations.

That state agencies do not monitor the hospitals' records on indigent patients.

That the Department of Health, Education and Welfare regional offices "condone this lack of effective evaluation and enforcement" by approving inadequate state plans.

Facilities receiving Hill-Burton funds are required to choose one of four options to calculate their free service obligation.

Hottum said although Methodist does not record services to Medicaid patients on the Medicaid forms, "our hospital exceeds its obligations in providing indigent patient care and we've not turned away any Medicaid patients."

METHODIST REBUFS CHARGES ON INDIGENTS (By Peggy Burch)

Methodist Hospital officials today rebuffed charges that they do not treat their share of indigent patients, saying the hospital provides 13 times more free medical services than federal regulations require.

C. Henry Hottum Jr., executive director of Methodist, said the hospital is required only to provide $105,699 in free medical services in 1973 under stipulations of a federal grant, but the hospital actually provided $1,387,494 in free medical services.

Hottum said "If we would put in all our free services, they would exceed $5 million for the year (1973)."

A government monitoring project yesterday submitted a report to a U.S. Senate subcommittee charging that some Southern hospitals, including Methodist, do not provide all the free medical services they agree to provide when they receive federal grants.

Allan Crimm, health consultant to Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, reported to the health subcommittee of the U.S. Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, that Methodist did not account for its free services by applying for federal reimbursement under the Medicaid program.

Harry C. Mobley, an administrator at Methodist, said the number of beds available at the hospital controls the amount of free service the hospital can render.

"We are always running about 90 per cent occupancy, and we review the charity work we've done on a monthly basis," he said.

Hottum said the hospital does not apply for Medicaid funds because the application system is too complex and the funds received for reimbursement "are inadequate."

"We have felt we were better off to forfeit the little money we would get from Medicaid, and continue with our present system," Hottum said.

The Southern Regional Council report also charged that the hospital did not treat indigent patients from Shelby County "because the administrator contends that indigents are supposed to use the county-operated hospital."

Hottum said Shelby County residents on Medicaid are not turned away from the hospital. "We have not broken down the dollar value of treatment for Shelby County patients, but 50 per cent of our charity patient days in 1973 were for Shelby County indigent patients," he said.

Hottum said free medical service to indigent patients at Methodist in 1974 will be 25 per cent more than the $1.3 million accounted for last year.

The Methodist officials said they had been reconsidering the hospital's decision not to apply for Medicaid funds prior to publication of Crimm's report.

"We are re-examining the Medicaid program constantly, but we keep coming back to our initial decision and reasoning not to apply," Mobley said.

NOVEMBER 26, 1974.

Mr. ALLEN CRIMM,
Southern Governmental Monitoring Project,
Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR MR. CRIMM: We must contest your report to the Health Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare dated November 25, insofar as your statements concerning Methodist Hospitals of Memphis, Tennessee, in which you state: "A Memphis, Tennessee facility, for example, will not admit residents of the county in which it is located. The administrator contends that indigents are supposed to go to the county-operated hospital for the medical care they need."

This is not true. We rendered over $600,000 in free care for indigent residents of Shelby County in 1973.

In July, your agent James C. Camp came unannounced to my office. I saw him on his first visit and answered some of his questions, including our position on the Medicaid program. For several reasons, we had not participated in the Medicaid program; but I told him we did not deny admission to the patients eligible for Medicaid, who chose to come in under the care of our House Staff. He asked for some figures, which I cited from memory. I promised to complete answering his questions and to furnish more specific figures, if he would give me more information about the Southern Governmental Monitoring Project. My reply was dated July 8, 1974, a copy of which is attached.

As you can see by the letter, during the year of 1973, we gave $1,367,494 of free care to indigent patients. This is far in excess of the government's requirement of 10% of our Hill-Burton Grants, which were $1,056,987. (10% thereof is $105,699). We have given as much free care to the indigents during the first 9 months of 1974, as we did in the full year of 1973. The number of patient days of care to residents of Shelby County represents 50% of our total patient days to the indigent. Therefore, your statements about our not servicing the indigent in Shelby County are completely false. These figures are exclusive of Medicare discounts and bad debts.

When all of our free services are computed, we will give this year over $7,000,000 of free service. This represents a larger percentage of our total patient income than the amount given by most voluntary private hospitals.

We expect you to correct the false information you are distributing regarding Methodist Hospitals of Memphis.

Sincerely yours,

C. HENRY HOTTUM,
Executive Director.

A TAX CUT AND TAX REFORM

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, support for a substantial tax cut to head off the gathering slide into a deeper recession is growing every day.

Economists Arthur Okun, Otto Eckstein, Charles Schultze, and Paul McCracken have all called for a tax cut, with both Okun and McCracken agreeing that the cut should be as large as $10-$15 billion, and Schultze suggesting $20 billion.

Henry Ford has proposed a 10-percent, $12-billion tax cut, as has Leonard Woodcock of the UAW. Board Chairman Irving Shapiro of duPont called for a tax cut yesterday.

A top Treasury economist, Sidney L. Jones, said yesterday that he personally favored an income tax cut, and even Messrs. Simon and Greenspan have indicated that a tax cut might be in order if the recession continues to worsen.

In considering this diverse outpouring of support for a tax cut, I was struck by a passage from Sidney Jones' speech of yesterday, as reported in today's Washington Post:

There comes a very exquisite point in the (business) cycle where you want to change policy, because if you wait until you see the need, it's too late.

That led to wonder whether perhaps that "exquisite point" did not come 6 months ago, when Walter Heller, Arthur Okun, Paul Samuelson, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator KENNEDY, myself, and others were proposing a modest $3 to $6-billion tax cut to stimulate the economy.

Our tax cut was denounced as dangerously inflationary then, but if it had been approved when we proposed it earlier this year, that money would now be in the hands of consumers, to be spent on housing, automobiles, household appliances, and perhaps a few Christmas gifts for their families.

Instead, we now face a massive deterioration in the economy, the lowest level of consumer confidence since World War II, the prospect of 8- or 9-percent unemployment, and the need for a tax cut of as much as $10 to $15 billion.

Mr. President, I believe now, as I have for many months, that the working people of this country, who have been cruelly tortured by inflation and higher taxes, need some tax relief.

It is a matter of justice, and it is a matter of sound economics. When Americans have enough money to support themselves and their families, and to buy the things that they need to live decently, everyone prospers. Business sales and profits are high, more jobs are created, and productivity and real income rises.

A substantial tax cut now would put extra money in the hands of consumers, and make up in some measure for the severe erosion of workers' real incomes in the last year.

Therefore, when the new Congress convenes in January, I plan to reintroduce the legislation I introduced a year ago to give taxpayers the option of taking a $200 credit for themselves and each of their dependents, instead of the existing $750 personal exemption.

This plan would cut the average family's tax bill by nearly $200, at a total cost of just over $6 billion.

In addition, it would concentrate the relief on those low- and middle-income families who have suffered the most from inflation and recession. While almost all families with incomes of $20,000 or less would receive some tax relief, nearly 80 percent of the relief would be concentrated on those making between $5,000 and $15,000.

The $200 optional credit would also substantially improve the equity and progressivity of our tax system. The existing $750 exemption is worth $525 in reduced taxes to wealthy Americans in the highest tax brackets, but only $105 in reduced taxes to Americans in the lowest brackets making only $5,000 a year. It provides the most relief to those who need it least, and the least relief to those who need it most. The $200 optional tax credit would make certain that every personal exemption is worth at least $200 in reduced taxes.

In order to provide relief to those whose incomes are so low they pay no taxes, the $200 optional credit should be combined with Senator RUSSELL LONG's "work bonus" for low-income workers with families. The work bonus, which passed the Senate earlier this week, would give each low-income worker with one or more children a credit equal to 10 percent of his or her income up to $4,000, and a smaller percentage of income up to $5,600. This would put an extra $600 million in the hands of the lowest income working Americans.

The nearly $7 billion in tax relief these two proposals would provide may not be enough to pull the economy out of the accelerating slide it is now in, however. In that event, a higher optional credit could be used, or the $200 credit could be combined with increases in the low-income allowance and the standard deduction.

I believe, however, that any tax cut that is agreed upon should concentrate relief on those low- and middle-income families who have suffered the most. An increase in the $750 personal exemption to $850 or $900 would not meet that test, since it would provide much greater benefits to the very wealthy than it would to those with low and middle incomes. Each $100 increase in the $750 exemption, for example, would be worth $70 in reduced taxes to those in the highest tax brackets, but only $14 to those in the lowest. I do not believe this is fair.

Similarly, an across-the-board percentage tax cut would provide much greater relief to those with higher incomes than to those who earn less. A family earning $40,000 and paying $8,000 in taxes would get $800 in relief from a 10-percent across-the-board tax cut, while a family making $15,000 and paying $1,700 in taxes would get only $170 in relief.

In addition to cuts in the individual income tax, we should consider a carefully focused cut in business taxes. For example, S. 4187, the Tax Reform and Relief Act of 1974, which I introduced on November 25 with 14 other Senators, would increase the investment tax credit from 7 percent to 10 percent for investment in excess of the average of the 3 preceding years. This $400 million business tax cut is designed to reward increases in job-producing, inflation-reducing capital investment, and, therefore, would give a direct, rifle-shot stimulus to investment. This kind of tax cut for business can be a constructive and useful part of an overall tax-stimulus package.

TAX REFORM

While a tax cut is very important, and should be acted upon promptly in the new Congress, we should not allow the need for a quick tax cut to deflect our attention from meaningful tax reform.

The Ways and Means Committee has already approved legislation—after more than a year of hearings and committee consideration—that would increase taxes on the oil industry by around $3 billion a year. I regret very much that this legislation was not approved by the full House and sent to the Senate in this session of Congress. While there would have been substantial obstacles to the prompt passage of this legislation in the Senate, I believe that Senate action might have been possible if we had received a bill from the House.

That is now behind us, however. Therefore, the first order of business in the new Congress must be prompt action on this oil and gas tax legislation. With the new makeup of the House Ways and Means Committee, I hope that the legislation can be made even stronger. The provisions dealing with foreign oil and gas income especially, while constructive, are quite modest. They can and should be strengthened.

If this oil and gas tax legislation is combined with a strengthening of the minimum tax on wealthy tax avoiders, repeal of the DISC export subsidy, and a few other reforms which have already been thoroughly considered, it should be possible to move promptly on a package combining both reform and relief.

Since the need for economic stimulus is now well understood, it should not be necessary to balance reform and relief. A package providing approximately $10 billion in tax relief and $3-$5 billion in revenue-raising reform could be appropriate. The main reform component—an increase in taxes on the large multinational oil companies—will raise revenue out of profits which are inordinate windfalls by almost any measure. As a result, the economic stimulus effect of the package is not likely to be significantly offset by the reform elements.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, we have just about run out of excuses for failure to act on meaningful tax reform and relief. Most of us have talked a good deal about the need for tax reform and relief. It is now time to do something about it.

LAND USE PLANNING IN VERMONT

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, the State of Vermont has long been held up to us as the model for progressive land use controls. We have been told that if we wish to see how the apparatus to be established under the Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act—S. 268—would work in practice, we need look no further than Vermont. Vermont land use control officials have been much in demand at various national conferences to explain how their Act 250 program is working.

Throughout all this we have never heard the slightest rumbling that perhaps the ordinary people of Vermont do not concur in the dreams of the planners and regulators. This year, however, businessmen, farmers, and working men are coming to recognize that Vermont's bewildering array of land use control measures is directly responsible for a serious shortage of jobs, housing, business profits, and tax revenues.

To bring members up to date on the happenings in Vermont, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article from the Vermont Watchman, October 1974 by a former member of the Vermont House, and a former aide to Senators Prouty and Percy here on the Hill, Mr. John McClaughry, of Lyndonville, Vt. It is reprinted from the October 1974, issue of the Vermont Watchman, a land use and environmental newspaper published occasionally by the Landowners Steering Committee, with offices at box 729, Lyndonville, Vt. 05851. I think Mr. McClaughry's article will provide some useful new insights to some Members of this body who have placed great faith in national land use planning and controls as the wave of the future.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VERMONT—THE ENVIRONMENTAL TIDE RECESSES

Three years ago Vermont was the joy and delight of the national environmental protection movement. For aside from Hawaii, which had inherited unusual land control programs from its territorial status, Vermont had become the first state to adopt a wide-ranging state-level environmental protection process. Students of land use control flocked to Vermont to find out how the celebrated Act 250 was working out in practice. By mid-1974, however, reporters were beginning to come to Vermont to see what had gone wrong.

For by 1974 Vermont's pioneering Act 250 was in serious trouble. From its inception there had been grumbling about administrative confusion, arbitrary permit rulings, and interminable delays. That was to be expected in any new program which gave citizen boards the power to pass on applications for complex developments. But that alone would not have become a tidal wave of opposition; and in any case, the administrative process was steadily improving with experience.

But first a bit of background. In 1968 the nation's economy was in high gear. People had money to spend. And many of those living in the larger cities of the Eastern seaboard began to consider buying second homes in some relatively accessible yet unspoiled rural area. The urban disorders of 1967 and 1968 accelerated this desire for many upper income whites.

Vermont had long been a beautiful but relatively distant backwater, known mainly for laconic farmers and a devotion to the Republican ticket. But in the mid-Sixties something new came to Vermont—the Interstate Highway System. By 1968 southern Vermont was a mere two hours drive from Boston, four hours from New York City. With its scenery, its skiing, its summer sports, and its relatively cheap land, Vermont suddenly became a mecca for urban expatriates and vacation home buyers. This did not escape the attention of second-home developers.

By summer of 1968 second-home developers were gobbling up southern Vermont's countryside at an unheard of pace. The International Paper Company, for example, proposed a huge second home village on 20,000 acres in Vermont's southeasternmost county. This trend led the new Governor, Republican Deane C. Davis, to name a Governor's Commission on Environmental Control in May of 1969.

This commission, chaired by Rep. (now Sen.) Arthur Gibb of Weybridge, issued its report in the fall of 1969. The report formed the basis for enactment of Act 250 by the 1970 legislature.

The Gibb Commission could have relied upon the traditional Vermont practice of local government control of development. Indeed, as of mid-1968 Vermont towns had sweeping powers to control development. The newly-enacted Municipal Planning and Development Act had authorized towns to impose stringent zoning and subdivision regulations, including such features as site plan approval, design control districts, performance standards, and planned unit development regulations.

In addition, local powers included requiring performance bonds before accepting private roads as town roads; power to reject private roads altogether; power to seek injunctive relief for nuisance; and sweeping powers in sewage disposal and health-related matters. With some additional provisions and technical assistance from state experts and lawyers, these powers could have dealt with any conceivable development. But that would have required a local will to act, and the Gibb Commission was not sure local people were sufficiently united in their concern about massive environmental change.

Thus the Gibb Commission embarked on another route—state control over development. In a gesture to local control, the Commission recommended the creation of district environmental commissions, staffed with laymen, to pass on permits. The criteria for the issuance of permits would be written into state law. A State Environmental Board would prepare guidelines for the permit process and act as an appeals board. Finally, two important plans were to be prepared for subsequent legislative approval—the "capability and development plan" and the "land use plan."

Initially, it was intended that the "capability and development plan" be sort of a master plan for the state, indicating which kinds of developments were best suited to which areas, in light of numerous policy considerations. The plan made public by the Environmental Board in November, 1972, made only a feeble attempt in this direction. The sweeping statements in the plan alarmed opponents of centralized planning, while the lack of detail and general vagueness dismayed the environmentalists.

The result was something of a legislative debacle. The capability and development plan submitted by the Board was promptly scrapped, as was an equally inchoate land use plan. In its place came a bewildering series of legislative drafts. Finally, on the last day of the 1973 legislative session, a bill bearing the name of a "capability and development plan" squeaked through to final passage. As the State Planning Director later admitted, however, the bill had little of a "capability and development plan" in it. Instead, it added considerable refinements to the permit criteria section of Act 250, and stated nineteen policies for future land use planning. These policies, however, had no regulator force and effect and were not codified into state statutes.

The final plan, the "land use plan," was to be statewide zoning pure and simple. Under the law, it was to "consist of a map and statements of present and prospective land uses based on the capability and development plan, which determine in broad categories the proper use of the lands in the state . . . to be further implemented at the local level by authorized land use controls such as subdivision regulations and zoning."

The first attempt at a land use plan, unveiled in late 1972, was so inept a document that neither outgoing Governor Davis nor incoming Governor Thomas P. Salmon was willing to sign it. But it had one important impact. It revealed that the ultimate end of the "Act 250 process" was not merely requiring environmental permits from "larger developers," but the complete centralization of power over the use and exchange of land in Montpelier.

For the first two and a half years after enactment of Act 250 there had been no organized opposition, although there was some unhappiness among developers subject to the permit requirement. Ironically, it was not Act 250 at all but a related measure, the Health Department Subdivision Regulations, which provoked the organization of opposition culminating in the smashing defeat of the Act 250 land use plan.

To stall development until a comprehensive law could be passed, Governor Davis in September 1969 approved the adoption by his Health Commissioner of "subdivision regulations." These strict regulations had the ostensible purpose of preventing the subdivision of land into lots which lacked adequate sewage disposal capability. The regulations did not come into effect until the third lot was subdivided, so many farmers and rural land owners did not feel its strictures. (The subdivision regulations so far exceeded the powers of the Health Commissioner in 1969 that the 1970 legislature had to be asked to ratify them ex post facto by reference.)

In November, 1972 Human Services Secretary William Cowles (under whom reorganization had placed the health department) issued new subdivision regulations. Bearing only marginal relation to sewage disposal, the new regulations were clearly designed to prevent subdivision. A spontaneous protest meeting was held in Lyndonville, in Vermont's relatively undeveloped Northeast Kingdom. The 75 people attending, about one third of whom were associated with the real estate business, voted to form a Land-owners Steering Committee. As a means of getting public attention, the group pledged to post some 100,000 acres of Vermont land against hunting, fishing, or snowmobiling.

While the cause of the protest was the subdivision regulations, the Steering Committee quickly recognized that far more of the same kind of thing was on the horizon. Under the leadership of Lyndonville realtor Gerald Farrington, the Steering Committee adopted a five-point program:

1. Reject the Act 250 land use plan.
 2. Put the responsibility for preserving the environment on the developer, not the mere seller of land.
 3. Prevent bureaucrats from imposing impossible regulations on the citizens without legislative approval.
 4. Enforce the laws against polluters.
 5. Allow multiple use of state-owned lands.
- From its inception the Land-owners Steering Committee was roasted in the environmentally-oriented daily press. Governor Salmon, who had previously distinguished himself by leading a "mini-filibuster" against Act 250 as a member of the Vermont House, scored with the environmental organizations by inveighing against "land rapists and fast buck artists" and ridiculed the "committee with the long name."

The Steering Committee quickly broadened its board to include representatives from 10 of Vermont's 14 counties, and launched a series of public meetings and radio spots to alert Vermonters to the issues. The environmental organizations responded with meetings of their own, plus attempts to suppress the opponents.

Despite the vigorous efforts of the Land-owners Steering Committee, and circulation of some 10,000 copies of its 24-page tabloid newspaper, the Vermont Watchman, the legislature of 1973 did enact a bill named a "capability and development plan." Actually, much of that "plan" was either advisory in nature or noncontroversial. Its main significance was that it was admittedly the legal foundation for the land use plan to be presented in 1974.

Following the 1973 legislative session, Governor Salmon called a press conference to announce that he intended to take personal direction of the program to develop a land use plan for 1974. From the beginning, however, the state planning office and the state environmental board engaged in a running battle over the form of the plan to be produced. To the delight of the opposition, Governor Salmon seemed either unwilling or unable to insist on a resolution of these differences.

In September, 1973 the State Planning Office, in conjunction with the various regional planning commissions, conducted a series of hearings on its proposal for a state land use plan. Scarcely had these hearings concluded when the Environmental Board took the field for its own set of hearings. Expressly disavowing the Planning Office draft, the Environmental Board offered no draft whatsoever. The purpose of the hearings was merely to gather opinion, said the Board; then it would retire to its chambers and bring forth the plan for submission to the Governor and legislature.

This rather cavalier approach by the board produced prompt criticism, and the board was ultimately forced to produce a draft plan and conduct seven additional hearings on it. Now, with the board's intentions revealed, public reaction arose quickly.

The Board's proposed plan was simply a state zoning scheme. The state was to be divided into seven zones. Each zone had its own set of purposes, allowed uses, prohibited uses, and density limitations. Local towns were given a year to prepare a zoning map "furthering the purposes of the State Land Use Plan." If they failed to do so, the state environmental board would supervise the zoning of the town. To satisfy the state environmental board, a town plan would have to comply with 16 detailed criteria.

A howl of protest went up at the unveiling of this plan—not only from previous opponents of centralized state planning, but also from local government officials. The plan's emphasis on keeping rural areas undeveloped clearly meant that growth in taxable development would be directed to regional centers. The plan promised tax chaos as the restrictions changed the value of land drastically and unpredictably. The plan virtually ordered the towns to provide for adequate housing for such people as the state thought ought to be living there—an idea already enunciated by the chairman of the environmental board, who claimed that towns should take over the responsibility for housing just as they had taken over schools and roads. This same gentleman's incautious declaration that "local control is out of the Dark Ages" did much to inspire and enlarge the opposition.

So did the deliberate refusal of the environmental board to produce the map, clearly called for by the statute. In open session, the board members, recalling the poor reception given to the abortive 1972 land use map, debate the "practicability" of complying with the law. Finally, they decide to ignore it and hope no one would notice. In this they made an egregious blunder.

Key legislators, including House Speaker Walter L. Kennedy, gave prompt notice to the board that if it intended to zone everyone's property, it would have to present the required map to the legislature. Two lawsuits to force the Board to produce the map were filed, and although both failed on technical grounds, they further dramatized the issue.

Throughout this furor Governor Salmon sided with the Environmental Board. Before a sportsmen's gathering in January, he said that publication of zoning maps would kill the whole plan—and that since his plan was too important to suffer this fate at the hands of an outraged citizenry, no maps would be published! But pressure built up rapidly, until the environmental board reluctantly asked the planning office to bring forth the maps. The maps were released in mid-February. Due to the necessary imprecision in zoning a whole state from the capitol, and to the extreme haste in which the maps were completed and rushed into publication, the maps carried countless errors which were immediately detected by local government officials and landowners. But more importantly, the maps dramatized the land use plan as statewide zoning, a charge frequently made but until that point not clearly proven.

And the board did another thing in its draft plan which produced a new wave of opposition. Since 1971 the board had been concerned about the apparent inapplicability of the land use plan to developments which lay below the statutory threshold for obtaining a permit, i.e., ten units of housing. So in October, 1972 the board adopted a resolution asking the legislature to amend the law to make it applicable to even the surveying of lot lines on a single lot!

Not only did the legislature not honor this request, it responded by inserting in the land use plan section of the law a sentence affirming that the land use plan would explicitly not apply to anything but "developments" as defined in the act—meaning ten or more housing units and industrial and commercial development on ten or more acres (one acre in unzoned towns).

When the board came to prepare a land use plan in 1973, this proscription caused great perplexity. How could a meaningful statewide zoning plan be put forth, when anyone might build nine houses in any open field without being governed by the restrictions in the plan? The board made the decision to ignore this provision of law by presenting a plan which covered every single acre, every single lot, in the state of Vermont.

Within 60 days of its approval by Governor Salmon, and within forty days of the publication of the maps, the 1974 Land Use Plan was as stone-cold dead as the Green Mountains in February. The end came at a tumultuous public hearing before the House Natural Resources Committee on February 28. Farmers, landowners and just plain citizens flocked to Montpelier 800 strong to berate the plan for over four hours, while only a handful of special interest representatives, principally architects, rose to defend it. The Committee, which had voted in favor of a watered-down version of the plan by a 7-4 margin the previous day, voted 9-2 the following day to shelve the whole project.

What happened between 1969 and 1974 to produce such a turn-around in public opinion? The factors must include the following.

First, more and more citizens became outraged by "bureaucratic rule" from Montpelier, often by technicians imported from out of state for the purpose. While this reaction flowed from a number of subjects, the land use plan was a highly suitable area for the oppressed citizenry to strike back. Second, the environmental board and Governor Salmon made nearly every mistake in the book. By taking an arrogant attitude toward the common sense and decency of the average Vermonter—and his local government—and by flaunting the clear provisions of the law, it became clear that someone was trying to put one over on Vermonters. That, historically, has not been easy to do.

Third, the economic boom of 1969 had given way to a period of economic uncertainty. Partly due to the land use regulations and partly due to other factors such as the stock market and interest rates, second home construction dropped off sharply, and with it, jobs and building profits disappeared. Perhaps worse, Vermont gained a reputation as a state in which every form of harassment known to man would be practiced against the honest businessman. In this climate Vermont became increasingly unattractive as a site for economic development of any kind.

Fourth, poor people and their spokesmen began to discover that little or no housing could be had within their reach. This was not entirely a new phenomenon, but it was unmistakably clear that the environmental rules and subdivision regulations had driven small lots off the market altogether. The curtailment of housing, like the curtailment of economic activity generally, was quite properly laid at the door of the "environmental extremists."

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Vermonters slowly came to realize that implicit in the series of land use plans and regulations offered by the environmentalists was a threat more serious even than the "no growth" philosophy which would cost them jobs and housing. For the land use plan approved by Governor Salmon carried in it the premise that privately-owned free-hold property is to be no more; that henceforth, all property would be "social property," "held rather than owned by individuals for the benefit of the society at large, i.e., the State."

This "social property" theory, openly espoused by a few honest advocates of the land use plan but beatified by others, meant that the state would, where it saw fit, impose regulations to the very furthest limit of its constitutional power without paying compensation to the landowner. It meant that the power over the sale and hence the exchange of all land in the state would ultimately be vested in a board of bureaucrats at the state capitol. And it posed a mortal threat to the ideals of individual liberty and a republican form of government that Vermonters have always held dear.

The land use battle in Vermont is far from ended. A special study commission was created by the 1974 legislature to come up with recommendations for further action in the wake of the 1974 land use plan's defeat. There will be another debate in 1975 on the report of that committee. While the recommendations contained in it are extremely modest in scope, Vermonters recognize it as yet one more, albeit small, step in the direction of the centralization of all power over land in the State. That is a direction in which most Vermonters, despite their deep reverence for their land and their environment, do not want to go.

For four exciting years Vermont was the model for the nation in the eyes of environmental organizations everywhere. But the experience in Vermont clearly shows a reverse swing of the pendulum. The initial surge toward replacing freehold property with social property has expired, and Vermonters are now turning away from that form of collectivism and seeking another way to deal with land use problems. That new way may well be as creative as the movement toward Act 250 regulation—but it will not be headed in the same direction.

S. 2792 PROVIDES NEW FLEXIBILITY IN PUBLIC LAW 480 LEGISLATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, yesterday's passage of S. 2792 amends the availability criteria for commodities which may be disposed of under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 familiarly known as Public Law 480.

Previously, the last sentence of section 401 provided that no commodities would be available for disposition under the act if such disposition would reduce the domestic supply of such commodity below that needed to meet domestic requirements, adequate carryover, and anticipated exports for dollars as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture at the time of exportation of such commodity.

The bill adds to this provision the clause "unless the Secretary determines that some part of the exportable supply should be used to carry out the national interest and humanitarian objectives of this act."

The proposal was offered in furtherance of the request made in the President's address to the joint session of Congress on October 8, 1974, in which he stated that authority was needed to waive certain of the restrictions on the disposition of commodities under the act based on national interest and humanitarian grounds.

In times of temporary shortages it becomes essential that the food assistance program under Public Law 480 not be discontinued abruptly—particularly in cases where continuation of the program is needed for the foregoing objectives.

Such authority would be needed sparingly, and only to meet needs of the highest priority. It would allow the United States to make a significant contribution toward alleviating human suffering and maintaining the economic stability of friendly foreign governments.

At the same time, use of this authority will have little impact on total supplies of any commodity, as quantities exported under Public Law 480 represent very small proportions of supply and total exports for most commodities. For example, exports of wheat and feed grains under the act in fiscal year 1974 amounted to 2.8 and 1.9 percent of total exports for those commodities, respectively.

Although it is difficult to assess the effect of the proposed bill on budget outlays, it is believed that enactment of the bill would have no significant budgetary impact.

We also added to the bill, as an amendment, a provision sponsored by Senator BREN and others which makes it clear as a statement of policy that commodities included under the international food aid program should also be available for domestic feeding programs.

This amendment gives a clear warning to the Department of Agriculture that it should not tamper with domestic programs while the same commodities are being furnished to other nations.

The act also includes a provision to amend the Food Stamp Act to require that effective March 1, 1975, not less than 20 percent of the total value of coupons issued to eligible households be usable only for beef, pork, poultry, or dairy product purchases.

Coupons are to be coded so as to be usable only for the purchase of beef, pork, poultry, or dairy products. The amendment authorizes the administering State agency to make exceptions to this requirement in cases where it is impractical with regard to a specific household.

The Food Stamp Act provides that coupons shall be issued in such amount as the Secretary of Agriculture determines to be the cost of a nutritionally adequate diet.

Since there is a surplus of animal protein in the United States, the committee urged the President and his advisers to explore all possible avenues with regard to the use of meat, poultry, and dairy products under Public Law 480 and other U.S. Government food aid programs.

S. 2792 is an important step in clarifying the Public Law 480 program and in utilizing surplus animal products at home and abroad. I commend the Senate for approving this measure, and I urge that the House also give its approval.

OF FORTUNES AND THE FED

Mr. BROCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the commentary by Nicholas Von Hoffmann entitled "Of Fortunes and the Fed" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the commentary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OF FORTUNES AND THE FED
(By Nicholas von Hoffmann)

It tells you something when Sears Roebuck and Co., the nation's largest retailer, announces a personnel layoff eight weeks before Christmas. Times are getting harder and so is the pressure to do something.

Many of the proposals—like public service jobs—which get pushed forward at moments of such distress don't do enough good to be considered more than demonstrations that Your Government Loves You. These gestures of symbolic affection, however, turn people away from thinking about structural changes in the way we run our political economy. The need to break out of our pattern of ad hoc improvisation on the peaks and valleys of the business cycle has never been greater because these hastily contrived measures—price control, emergency loans and the forced feeding of enormous amounts of money into the system—are becoming progressively less effective.

It would pay us better to spend less time debating illogical schemes like the gasoline tax and poke around joints like the Federal Reserve Board. With the zero publicity the Board gets many people may think the Federal Reserve has something to do with administering government reservoirs when, in reality, the Fed has more to do with good times or the lack of them than any other single agency in Washington. The Fed controls our money supply.

You must consult such recondite business publications as Fortune magazine (July issue) to learn it is there that much of the blame for our double-digit inflation belongs. Specifically the magazine charges the board's chairman, Arthur Burns, with creating a false prosperity for the '72 election by flooding the country with a torrent of inflation currency.

This isn't the first time the Fed has been suspected of playing such dangerous games. The man who preceded Burns in his job did the same sort of thing for the '68 election with similar results, an upward surge in prices followed by unemployment. But Burns' critics, who are numerous and growing in business and economic circles, aren't accusing him of doing anything improper, only of pursuing mistaken policies for erroneous reasons.

Part of that goes to how Burns and his fellow Federal Reserve governors think as economists and politicians; part goes to the nature of the Fed itself. The decisions on monetary policy—decisions which weigh so heavily on how much you're going to pay for bread, milk and rent, or whether you're going to have a job or be laid off—these decisions are made by an arcane group within the Fed called the Open Market Committee. Its members are Burns, the six other governors, and, in rotation, five of the 12 presidents of the regional Federal Reserve Banks.

These gentlemen meet monthly, decide what the monetary policy of the United States is going to be and then tell no one about it. They keep it secret, only issuing instructions to another gentleman in New York who executes their orders. Ninety days after each meeting they routinely release a summary of what they talked about, but in languages so darkly Delphic that even men who've put in a lifetime of learning about our monetary system have trouble figuring out what the Fed has said it is doing. As a consequence a whole profession has been created of people who try to divine what the Sam Hill the Fed is up to. They're the domestic Kremlinologists of American economics.

The reasons for the secrecy aren't sinister. It's supposed to discourage sharp traders from cashing in on the information, but the rumors, tips, speculation and purportedly inside dope swirling about the Fed would seem to have exactly the opposite effect from the one intended.

However that may be, the nation's prosperity is still hugely affected by 11 guys who nobody has ever heard of, operating as a committee that everybody is ignorant of. Congress can struggle to balance the budget and the fruits of its fiscal responsibility can be canceled out by policy decisions that aren't even announced until three months after they're made.

In this clandestine nonsense Burns is but following the ancient traditions of his organization. He isn't the first man to orchestrate disaster in a closet. History teaches us that the same kind of secretive, well-intentioned madness brought on the massive bank closings of 1932-33 and the recessionary collapse of 1937 which prolonged the Great Depression another dreary, unnecessary four years.

Even now it's suspected—nobody outside the Fed can know for sure—that our monetary policies have been turned around 180 degrees, that the Fed is building the foundations of a new inflationary rush. It's possible that if the Fed made its decisions out in the open they'd still make the same mistakes, but, since the citizenry must pay the consequences, the least the Fed can do is to go public and thereby give the rest of us fair warning.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record an editorial written by Robert Martin, editor of the University of South Dakota newspaper, Volante.

Mr. Martin's editorial view manifests a great deal more rationality on the Middle East question than exists in many sources of opinion today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the University of South Dakota newspaper, Volante, S. Dak., Nov. 19, 1974]

PUBLIC OPINION MANEUVERED TO ACCEPT WAR
There has been growing speculation on the part of military and political leaders that it may become a necessity to effect a military takeover of oil fields under the sovereign control of Arab nations if the oil "price gouge" continues to affect our "vital interests," as they state.

This change in attitude by political and military leaders has been accompanied by the derogatory characterization of Arabs as big, greedy, money-hungry slob. As an example of this, this week's political cartoon was especially selected to help emphasize the point. Also, witness over the past few weeks' cartoons in Time Magazine showing much the same stereotype of an Arab taking a bite out of the world with the caption stating, "Araburger."

In a recent column Jack Anderson stated that the "repercussions of Western countries being economically ruined by the price of oil would affect the vital interests of the United States. The use of the term vital interests is ominous. For it is understood that the United States will go to war, if necessary, to protect its vital interests." According to Anderson, one top policymaker compared the oil gouge by Arab nations to Pearl Harbor.

Anderson also stated in the same column that, "President Ford has taken a harder line in the strategy sessions. Our sources say the President is willing to use United States military power as a last resort to prevent the oil cartel from causing disastrous economic and political dislocations in the West." Such frightening and threatening speculation by the President is demoralizing, especially keeping in mind his continual failure to act against the price gouging on the part of the major oil companies and his repeated failure to spark any anti-trust action against the major oil companies.

Also in the Anderson column of last week is the following statement. "Just as the United States didn't try to stop the Soviet Union from invading Czechoslovakia, Kissinger believes the Soviet wouldn't likely risk a nuclear war with the United States over Mid East oil." The analogy between the Soviet Union going into Czechoslovakia and the United States taking over an independent, sovereign Arab country is at best absurd. The relationship between the Soviet Union and Warsaw Pact nations is completely different than the relationship of the United States and the Arab bloc countries. Given the Russian interest in Middle East oil and Russian Naval superiority in the Mediterranean and ground troop concentration along its borders with Iran and Turkey, it's ridiculous to think the Soviet Union would sit idly by while the United States sent Marines in to take over Arabian oil fields.

Americans should be aware of these subtle attempts to maneuver public opinion into hating "Arab types" which would be the first step in preparing the public to accept a hostile situation in the Middle East in which the United States could be one of the belligerent nations involved in the conflict.

STATEMENT OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTION OF CERTAIN NOMINEES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, pursuant to section 4 of Public Law 93-475, approved October 26, 1974, I am submitting a statement of political contributions of certain nominees.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Post: Ambassador to India. Nominated December 14, 1974.

CONTRIBUTIONS

1. Self: William B. Saxbe, none.
2. Spouse: Ardath K. Saxbe, none.
3. Children and Spouses Names: William Bart Saxbe, Jr. & Anne, none; Charles Rockwell Saxbe & Suzy, none; Juliet Saxbe Lope-man & Sam Lope-man, none.
4. Parents names: Mother, Faye Carey Saxbe, none.
5. Grandparents names: Deceased.
6. Brothers and spouses names: none.
7. Sisters and spouses names: Betty Saxbe Sparks & Carl Sparks, none.

I have listed above the names of each member of my immediate family including their spouses. I have asked each of these persons to inform me of the pertinent contributions made by them. To the best of my knowledge, the information contained in this report is complete and accurate.

WM. B. SAXBE.

Subscribed and sworn (or affirmed) before me this 17th day of December A.D. 1974, at Washington, District of Columbia.

[SEAL] SHARON SCHULTZ,
Notary Public.
Commission expires May 31, 1977.

Post: Ambassador to Sierra Leone. Nominated: December 11, 1974.

CONTRIBUTIONS

1. Self: $50, October 19, 1972. Committee to Re-Elect the President (see attached supplemental statement).
2. Spouse: (see attached supplemental statement).
3. Children and spouses names: Joel Samuels, none.
4. Parents names: Myrrel F. Perenyi, none. (Father—deceased).
5. Grandparents names: Deceased.
6. Brothers and spouses names: William J. Samuels, none; Ellen E. Samuels, none.
7. Sisters and spouses names: None.

I have listed above the names of each member of my immediate family including their spouses. I have asked each of these persons to inform me of the pertinent contributions made by them. To the best of my knowledge, the information contained in this report is complete and accurate.

M. A. SAMUELS.

Subscribed and sworn (or affirmed) before me this 25th day of Nov. A.D. 1974, at Washington, D.C.

[SEAL] STELLA ———,
Commission expires July 31, 1979.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT

Prior to the 1974 primary election for the D.C. City Council, my wife served as Assistant Treasurer in the campaign of Delano Lewis. Democratic candidate for an At-Large seat. In this capacity, she volunteered considerable time, the use of our car, and the cost of baby sitters. For this same campaign, I donated two African masks that were later auctioned for $55 to help cover campaign expenses.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS FROM 1970-74
Nominee: Thomas James Scotese. Nominated: December 13, 1974.
Post: American Embassy, Sanaa, Yemen Arab Republic.

CONTRIBUTIONS

Self: none.
Spouse: none.
Children: none.
Parents: Mrs. Vasiliki Scotese, none; Mrs. Helen Sarides (M-in-law), none.
Grandparents: none.
Brothers and spouses: Maj. Theodore J. Scotese, none; Mrs. Nathalia Rocchi Scotese, none.
Sisters and spouses: Mrs. Anne Scotese Haydon, none; Mr. John M. Haydon, none.

I have listed above the names of each member of my immediate family including their spouses. I have asked each of these persons to inform me of the pertinent contributions made by them. To the best of my knowledge the information contained in this report is complete and accurate.

THOMAS JAMES SCOTES.

Subscribed and sworn before me this 8th day of December A.D. 1974, at the American Embassy, Damascus, Syrian Arab Republic.

DONALD E. MUND,
American Consul.

Post: Barbados. Nominated November 19, 1974.

CONTRIBUTIONS

1. Self: Theodore R. Britton, Jr., $200, June 6, 1972, (dinner) Nat'l Black Committee for Re-election of the President.
2. Spouse: Ruth B. A. Britton, none.
3. Children (5) all unmarried: Theodore R. Britton III, none; Renee A. Britton, none; Warren E. Britton, none; Sharon Y. Britton, none; Darwin A. Britton, none.

ECONOMIC CONCENTRATION IN THE FOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, our country faces a shortage of beef by 1976 because the livestock industry has been neglected by the Nixon and Ford administrations and because of the rise of food conglomerates.

Shortages of vital materials and products have become the rule, rather than the exception. But in the case of meat we have a situation where the producers want to supply the country's needs, and they could if only they were paid a fair price for their livestock.

Nevertheless, the administration refuses to restrict foreign agricultural imports, and it pampers the giant chain-stores, processors and packinghouses. I believe there is ample evidence suggesting that food conglomerates are manipulating the livestock market and fixing prices all the way to the supermarket shelf.

A successful lawsuit brought by a group of ranchers against the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co.—A. & P.—resulted in a $32-million settlement. The court indicated that the food chain had manipulated market prices through price fixing.

Despite this evidence, we have seen no action by the Justice Department, or any other part of the Ford administration, to initiate antitrust action in the food industry.

That is why I intend to make the Family Farm Antitrust Act a top priority in the next Congress.

And I hope it will be possible for Congress to force the hand of the administration to restrict foreign agricultural imports that are unfairly competing with American food producers.

Mr. President, two recent writings have called attention to the economic concentration in the food industry. They include "Who Will Sit Up With The Corporate Sow?" by the Center for Rural Affairs, Waltill, Nebr., and the President's Column from the South Dakota Union Farmer, by Ben Radcliffe, Huron, S. Dak.

I ask unanimous consent that these articles be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WHO WILL SIT UP WITH THE CORPORATE SOW?
This is a report on developments which are re-shaping hog production in Nebraska.

The general trend in recent years has been for food manufacturers to attempt to control the production of the raw farm products which they process. They do this by owning or directly contracting with the farm operations that produce those products. This is called vertical integration.

Because vertical integration means a loss of cherished independence for the farmer, it has earned a bad reputation. Through vertical integration, some of the world's biggest conglomerate corporations like IIT, Greyhound, Esmark, and others, are muscling into agricultural production.

This concerns not only farmers, but consumers as well who are not pleased with the prospects of relying on vertically integrated giants for food as they now do for petroleum.

The United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) concedes that substantial integration already exists in some food lines (broiler chickens, vegetables, fruits, to name some) but consistently downplays its overall importance, especially in livestock.

For instance, in a recent status report on vertical integration, USDA maintains that it is necessary to use "best judgment" estimates in describing the extent of vertical integration in many commodities, including hogs. They note that occasional surges in contract production have taken place in the hog industry, but see it as a very small part of the total output. They project no rapid increase in integration due to its slow growth in the 1960-1970 decade.

Since 1970, however, new attempts by feed companies and packing houses to integrate hog production have been reported by farmers. Contracts supplying essential production inputs have been viewed with suspicion and the creation of swine leasing operations by some of the larger feed companies has caused more alarm. Fear has been heightened by the recent publicity surrounding a proposed breeding-to-processing, totally integrated operation in Northeastern Missouri that could produce an astounding 2.5 million hogs a year.

The impact of such an operation on hog farmers would be overwhelming. It could produce over half of what all 28,000 producers in Nebraska turned out in 1973.

Recent reports of the collapse of this proposed operation have done little to relieve concern about trends toward concentration of farm production in fewer commercial farms.

Pork has traditionally been a small farm commodity. The pork producer typically has a diversified farm, raising feed grains and cash crops as well as other livestock. He handles every aspect of raising hogs: breeding, farrowing, fattening and marketing. He finances his own operation, marketing about 150 to 200 hogs per year. He makes his own management decisions, runs his own risks in the market place, and sometimes sits up at night with a farrowing sow. Disease susceptibility and the delicate business of farrowing pigs from sows have tended to prevent large scale production.

There are signs that this scenario is undergoing rapid change. If it is, there is more at stake than the independence of hundreds of thousands of pork producers. At stake is the availability of and control over a substantial portion of the daily menu of American families.

In a concentrated industry, where a few firms control the supply of a product, the product is available only on their terms—which means at their price. Their efficiency is relatively less important than their total sales. On the other hand, unlike the hog factory, the struggling independent hog producer matches his wits, his skill, and his dedication with that of his peers. As shifts occur toward large scale production, consumers can begin to worry about the price of pork. After all, who will sit up with the corporate sow?

Are these shifts occurring? This report was prepared in order to provide a view from the ground of the status of hog integration and large scale production in Nebraska.

IMPLICATIONS

People who suspect that a rapid expansion in large scale hog production is taking place will have their suspicions confirmed by this report. The implication is that hog production will become more specialized, capital intensive, and dependent on sophisticated technology. The role of the individual producer will diminish.

The evidence presented here shows an amazing mushrooming in large scale corporate confinement, especially in feeder pig production in the past 3 years. The 39 farrowing units inventoried in this report alone farrow over 22,000 sows (more than 7% of the sows farrowed in Nebraska in 1973), equivalent to the production of 1,600 average individual producers. Two-thirds of these were added in the past 18 months. Moreover, most managers indicate an intent to expand, even as hog prices dip to catastrophic lows in mid 1974.

In fact, the dramatic and sudden intrusion of corporate confinement in Nebraska signals the removal of feeder pig production from the farm to the factory in relatively few years. If current trends continue, feeder pig production on family farms will be as rare in 1980 as broiler chicken production is today.

The development of specialization in the breeding stock business is even more pronounced. Obviously, these companies are promoting confinement operations as a marketing strategy for their breeding stock business. They sense an opportunity to get an inside position on what promises to be the wave of the future in hog production technology.

But beyond that, the apparent preference of the two most aggressive breeders promoting confinement for subchapter S structures over co-ops implies that their marketing strategy involves basic changes in the structure of the pork industry. They are confident that confinement will attract new and inexperienced money into hog production through subchapter S corporations and therein lies their best market for breeding stock. Their strategy is to sell a whole range of services to these new "producers"—management, construction, planning consultations, and other services which the investment oriented shareholder who wants to minimize his own decision-making finds attractive or necessary. Of course, this package is most attractive to the non-farmer whose experience is nil, but it is also useful to the farmer for whom feeder pig production is a new operation.

The reluctance of co-ops to utilize these breeder-offered packages indicates also that these plans represent a significant loss of independence for them.

Overall, the emerging breeding stock industry is a hustle which confinement has made possible.

It is significant that a number of confinement units identified here are well outside of traditional hog producing areas. This partly reflects the potential of confinement for accommodating livestock production to environmentally harsh areas.

It also reflects the "movement" of the corn belt to the west, where irrigation, hybrids, and chemical fertilization have made increased feed grain production possible in Plains states. This has created isolated grain markets and cheap corn, a natural attraction to big, new livestock business.

As livestock moves into these areas however, it moves farther away from major hog markets, increasing price risks and transportation costs. This has implications for marketing methods. The tendency in such cases is to forward contract, to sell direct to packers on pre-arranged terms, and to adopt other marketing practices that reduce risks. Reliable, large scale producers are attractive to packers, too. This is visible in the Royal Lean system. As a result, terminal and auction markets will be further eroded. The combination of breeding stock specialization, large scale production and movement into new areas, all point to more loss of producer independence.

The most aggravated loss of independence is present in the SBA-financed "custom" operations that provide services to Super Pig, Inc.

These "small businesses" are required by the terms of their SBA loans to farrow only other people's hogs on a custom basis. Since Holt County is one of the "new hog areas" it is unlikely that these four custom operators could secure other customers of the same size if Super Pig, Inc., were to abandon them. The combined effect of being isolated from markets and being limited to custom operations makes these "producers" little more than hired laborers with their own investment at stake as well as their jobs. Moreover, 35% ownership of their facilities by the principal in Super Pig adds to their compromising position. The parallels between this type of operation and the integration of the broiler industry are powerful.

In fact, the presence of one dominant figure in each phase of this coordinated operation suggests that the entire setup is an effective scheme for getting public financing for a vertically integrated corporate farming operation.

The use of publicly subsidized financing for this purpose should be questioned. In the first place, SBA does not finance the independent producers who must compete against these pork hotels. In the second place, SBA financing of custom operations only gives corporate integrators the means by which to entice individuals into financial and contractual relationships which obligate them to the integrator. Once their investment is poured into these expensive facilities, their options are few. They are not unlike indentured servants, a condition of labor this country purported to repudiate over one hundred years ago.

Even more disconcerting than SBA financing is the appearance of tax shelter gimmicks in hog production. These have been justified for cattle feeding and other agricultural operations as a method of attracting the capital by which the industry expands and becomes more efficient. Until confinement made large scale hog production feasible however, there was no need to attract these large amounts of capital.

Obviously, the conditions now exist by which tax shelters can be used extensively in hog production. The predominance of subchapter S units over co-ops suggest that the tax laws are already being used extensively to attract equity capital—both farm and non-farm—into hog production. The fact that expansion of existing subchapter S corporations continues despite fluctuating markets, implies an incentive besides efficiencies of size.

In fact, most of the new growth in large scale confinement can be expected to occur in subchapter S units rather than cooperatives for just this reason. Operationally speaking, the co-op is just as efficient as the subchapter S, and if the level of agricultural knowledge of the owners is a factor, the co-ops are likely to be technically even more efficient. However, the competitiveness of the subchapter S unit has been written into the tax laws. With the tax break for big money, the subchapter S can amass capital more easily than the co-op. It tends therefore also to attract better heeled investors, and especially those with assets outside of agriculture. This makes securing additional financing easier. All things considered, the subchapter C corporation has artificial advantages over the co-op which are not related to efficiency.

These are principal factors in the erosion of independent production, even when independent producers are together in legitimate co-ops.

Furthermore, as confidence in large scale production spreads, more sophisticated tax investment methods such as limited partnership schemes can be expected to develop. These developments will hasten a shift in production to the commercial companies like the giants in the cattle feeding business, where less than one half of one per cent of the firms produce over half of the cattle. There is nothing at this point that suggests that these events will not occur, nor is there any substantial climate of opinion which provides hope that a solution will be offered that will protect the independent producer or producer co-ops.

There are additional questions raised that have not been addressed in this report.

One question is the environmental impact of large scale confinement. Regarding waste management, Thomas J. Mulligan of Hydroscience, Inc., and J. C. Hester of Greyhound Corporation recently reported the following to a Cornell Conference on Waste Management: "This waste disposal problem is of relatively recent origin. In the past, animal raising was conducted on relatively large areas where the animal wastes were readily assimilated by the land. However, current advances in nutrition of livestock, in the development of improved agricultural practices, and in the effective control of disease have fostered the confined raising of animals, so that individual, small farm operations are declining and the number of large scale raising facilities are increasing. All of these advances have significantly increased the quantity and quality of animals produced, but not without increased environmental problems."

This implies that there are unaccounted for costs, direct and indirect, that society must pay for this type of production.

The direct cost is the actual capital that must be spent to protect the environment from the pollution of animal wastes.

Lee R. Schuster of Schuster Farms, Inc., summed it up when he said in Proceedings of the 1972 Cornell Agricultural Waste Management Conference, "Eventually I have no doubt but that society will pay for pollution control through higher costs of retail."

The indirect costs are the social costs of industrializing the agricultural economy. We also need to question the increasing trend toward scientifically, genetically constructed hogs that become vulnerable to life outside of confinement.

Finally, questions need to be raised as to the future quality of confined pork and the possible effects on human consumption of massive doses of antibiotics in feed and other chemicals used in confinement hog production.

PRESIDENT'S COLUMN
(By Ben Radcliffe)

For years all of us involved in farming and ranching have suspected that there was "something rotten in Denmark" with regard to the price spread between producer and consumer. That suspicion has now been proved in a court of law.

The recent conviction of the A&P (Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co.) supermarket chain on charges of price fixing should be greeted with extreme satisfaction by South Dakota farmers and ranchers. Hopefully this court decision will provide the impetus for an in-depth review of the market spread between producers and consumers that has, for years, robbed both segments.

The verdict, delivered by a federal jury in San Francisco, requires the giant retailer to pay $32.7 million in damages to ranchers and livestock producers from California and Colorado.

PALESTINIANISM: AN UNRESOLVED PROBLEM OF THE UNITED NATIONS

(Address of Harrison M. Symmes to the Windham County World Affairs Council, Brattleboro, Vt., United Nations Day, October 24, 1974)

Ladies and gentlemen, tonight I shall be critical of certain aspects of our government's policy in the Middle East. Having retired from the career Foreign Service only six months ago and knowing the difficulties of policy-making, I do not make these criticisms lightly. It is important in my view for criticisms to be made responsibly and understood clearly, and I shall therefore speak from a text.

WHAT IS PALESTINIANISM?

Obviously it is a special kind of nationalism that has to do with an area of the world called Palestine and thus it involves land or territory. But it also involves people and their political and cultural aspirations. To understand Palestinianism we must consider some background, first about the land involved and then about the people. Then we can discuss how and why Palestinianism is a problem of the United Nations and why it remains unresolved.

The Palestine we are talking about once included all of the present state of Israel and the West Bank of Jordan. It stretched from the southern borders of Lebanon and Syria to Sinai and from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River. From 1920 until 1948 this territory had been administered by the British Government under a Mandate of the League of Nations. The Mandate ultimately was to achieve its independence under the tutelage of the British authority.

From its inception in 1945 the United Nations had been seized with the question of Palestine, but its first major decision on the matter came in 1947. On November 29, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly by the necessary two-thirds majority approved the partition of the Palestine Mandate. The Partition Plan provided for the creation of an Arab State, a separate Jewish state, and an international regime for the City of Jerusalem as a corpus separatum to be administered by the United Nations.

The British Mandate authority officially gave up its control of Palestine on May 15, 1948. The Jewish portion of the former Mandate immediately proclaimed itself the sovereign state of Israel and was recognized within hours by the United States and the Soviet Union. The Arab-designated area reacted differently. Most of the people in the Arab areas of Palestine had rejected the notion of Partition from the time it was first proposed by study commissions organized by the British during the 1920's and 1930's. Supported by the neighboring Arab states, the Palestine Arabs had argued that partition violated the principle of self-determination of peoples and that the United Nations, like the League of Nations before it, had no jurisdiction to partition national territories.

The Arab states thus attempted in 1948 to upset the Partition Plan by military force and set out to vanquish the state of Israel. In the ensuing military engagements during 1948 some of the land assigned to the Palestinian Arabs was lost to the Israelis. The larger portion of Arab Palestine—what has been called the "West Bank of Jordan" or, since 1967, the "occupied West Bank"—was annexed by King Abdullah of Jordan in 1949. The international area of Jerusalem, the third area of Palestine to which the Partition applied, was captured during 1948 from Jordanian forces by Israel and was declared to be the capital of Israel. (I should note that to this day neither Jordan's annexation of the West Bank nor Israel's occupation of Jerusalem has been accorded de jure recognition by most of the major member states of the United Nations.)

The foregoing briefly accounts for what happened to the territory assigned to the Palestine Arabs by the Partition Plan.

WHAT ABOUT THE PEOPLE?

To answer that question we must again review some history. In 1917, in response to the world Zionist movement, the British Government had issued the Balfour Declaration by which it unilaterally undertook to help establish a national home for the Jews in Palestine. It is well to recall the actual words of the Balfour Declaration:

"HM Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people . . . it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country."

In 1917 the final outcome of World War I was still very much in doubt. The area that later became the Palestine Mandate was almost entirely inhabited by Arabs and was under the control of the Turkish Empire. The Arab people in Palestine together with the other Arabs under Turkish domination had developed a strong sense of Arab nationalism. They longed to achieve self-determination and to free themselves from Turkish rule. Exploiting this nationalism, the British Government—through agents such as Colonel Lawrence—had made basic commitments to the Arab nationalists concerning their political future. In return for these commitments many of these Arabs had joined the Allies in active hostilities against the Turkish Empire.

In 1917 ninety percent of the population of Palestine was Arab. By 1922, 85 percent of the population of the Palestine Mandate was Arab. In the Mandate census of 1931, 80 percent was still Arab. But as European Jews migrated to Palestine during the Nazi persecution, the population ratio in Palestine steadily changed. By 1948, when the British Mandate ended, the percentage of Arabs in Palestine was only 55 percent. There were then about one million and a half Palestine Arabs (10 percent of whom were Christians.)

In the violence that erupted in 1947 and 1948, more than 750,000 Palestinian Arabs fled to neighboring Arab countries. Why did they flee? Think back to the 1930's and 1940's. There were both Jewish and Arab terrorist groups operating against each other and against the British Mandate authority. The Stern Gang, the Irgun, and other Jewish terrorist groups were carrying out actions that were just as shocking in their inhumanity as actions carried out then and since by the Arab fedayeen groups. In any case, many Palestinian Arabs fled. These refugees and their descendants, together with an additional several hundred thousand Palestinians displaced from the West Bank during and after the 1967 war, now number more than 2 million people. They are mainly concentrated in the east and west bank areas of Jordan, the Gaza strip, Lebanon, and Syria. Almost a million of them live in so-called emergency camps, often in tents or makeshift shelters. Some have so lived since 1948.

As I mentioned earlier the Arab reaction to the Mandate had been that the land of Palestine was theirs and that the foundation of a Jewish national home in Palestine by the Zionists could only be at Arab expense. We therefore see that two nationalisms were contending with each other for the same piece of territory. The Palestine Arabs fought against the Mandate Authority primarily to prevent continued Jewish immigration to Palestine. The Jews fought against the Mandate authority to urge it to allow increased immigration. And so went the twenties and thirties in Palestine. The horrors of the Nazi holocaust and the failures of the world community to prevent the slaughter of millions of Jews, or for that matter to provide these

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record an address by Harrison M. Symmes to the Windham County World Affairs Council in Brattleboro, Vt., on October 24, 1974. Mr. Symmes has served in the State Department for many years and was our Ambassador to Jordan from October 1967 to August 1970.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

December 19, 1974

Jews with any alternative to seeking a home in Palestine, exacerbated the problem beyond belief. The Jewish people were faced with "extermination", not just "self-determination."

If Zionism was the national force behind the emergence and the sustaining of the State of Israel, Palestinianism is the nationalist force and feeling that has animated the more than 2½ million Arabs that are now spread in an Arab diaspora throughout the various Arab countries and Israel. To this day the Palestinians have never been able to agree upon a single preferred course of national action. Nevertheless, a sense of national identity and a set of nationalist aspirations bind them together as Palestinians, and no amount of words can obscure that fact.

By adopting the Partition Plan, the United Nations irrevocably made Palestinianism a United Nations problem, and it cannot wash its hands of the problem. Since 1947 probably more UN time and effort has been spent on the Palestine problem in its various ramifications than on any other matter that has come before the UN. In December 1948 in a major effort to regain control of the Middle Eastern situation after the failure of the Partition Plan, the United Nations had established a Palestine Conciliation Commission. The establishing resolution (UNGA 194 III) provided:

"... the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property... the Conciliation Commission to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement, and economic and social rehabilitation of the refugees and the payment of compensation..."

More tangibly, the United Nations established an agency to provide emergency relief for the refugees in 1949; twenty-five years later that "emergency" relief is still provided by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA). United Nations Truce Supervision Organizations were established to police the armistices worked out between the Arab states and Israel following the 1948 battles. United Nations Emergency Forces were established following the 1956, 1967, and 1973 wars to provide military forces to try to prevent violations of truce and ceasefire arrangements from erupting into full-scale wars such as those of 1956, 1967, and October 1973. A mere listing of the resolutions on the Palestine problems takes volumes.

Last September 19 the "question of Palestine" was placed as a separate item on the agenda of the General Assembly. This was a major and significant procedural departure. In previous Assembly sessions, discussions of Palestine were confined to the UN Political Committee. The usual procedure was for the Political Committee to receive and discuss a report from the moribund Palestine Conciliation Commission with respect to what had transpired since its last report. The Political Committee would also hear a report from UNRWA on the refugee situation and if necessary would renew the UNRWA mandate and its appropriation. So far as the Arabs were concerned the principal objective in these Political Committee meetings was to achieve reaffirmation of the statements in the 1948 PCC resolution calling for the repatriation and compensation of the refugees. Against this background of downplaying the Palestine question in the General Assembly, the inscription of the question on the main agenda of the Assembly last month was a substantial change.

The inscription of the item on the agenda immediately raised the question of how the Palestinians themselves would participate in the debate. Early this month the General Assembly considered the question of participation and decided by a lopsided margin of more than 100 votes to 4 to allow the Palestine Liberation Organization (the PLO) to speak in the Assembly debate on the Palestine question. That debate is to commence in early November.

The United States and Israel were among the four states that voted against allowing the PLO to speak in the debate. Israel earlier had been outspoken also in its opposition to allowing the PLO or any other Palestinian organizations to participate in the Geneva talks designed to build upon the fragile cease fires that followed the October war of 1973. This Israeli position is understandable given the public positions the PLO and other Palestinian organizations have taken on terrorism. But it also reflects a more basic Israeli policy of long standing to eradicate if possible the very mention of the word Palestine in official international documents.

Similarly, King Hussein of Jordan has insisted that he must speak at Geneva or in any other forums in negotiating with Israel to regain former Jordanian-controlled territory captured by the Israelis in 1967. Hussein's position, which can be described at best as being ambiguous and ambivalent, seems to be that since the Palestinian territory of the West Bank was lost while under Jordanian control, he should negotiate for its return. In ambiguous statements he has said that after the return of the territory he will allow the Palestinians to determine what kind of constitutional arrangement they want with the Kingdom of Jordan, a decision he never allowed them when the West Bank was under his control.

The United States in recent months has seemed to be supporting the Israeli and Jordanian positions that the issue of the Palestinian interests on the occupied West Bank should be settled entirely within the context of possible talks between Jordan and Israel. Inherent in this position is acceptance of the possibility that the outcome of such Jordanian and Israeli talks will be further loss of Palestinian Arab territory to Israel, for Israel has made it quite clear that it intends to retain certain areas of the West Bank. In fact it has been reported reliably in the press that Secretary Kissinger feels strongly that Jordan as a friend of the United States should be entitled to try to negotiate the return of some, if not all, of the territory lost to Israel in 1967.

In a somewhat backhanded way, the Washington Post on September 23 advocated the policy line being followed by the United States and Israel. The Post stated in part:

"That the Palestinian question has been brought again to the United Nations—as a political question not a refugee issue—is well and good. It is a political question and the United Nations is meant to deal with such questions. But the whole situation has been transformed since the first (and last) time the United Nations addressed the issue, in 1948, when the Palestinians were offered a state of their own and they turned it down. Specifically, it is no longer within the capacity of the United Nations to offer Palestinians a statehood. That can only result now from a process in which Israelis and Jordanians are involved. Certainly the United Nations should hear the arguments, shrill and harsh though they no doubt will be. But the United Nations should not endorse terror, or trample on the sovereignty of its member states, or complicate the already immensely difficult task of the three principal local parties to work out a relationship of their own."

I can only say in passing that the Post editorial completely disregards the causes and issues that are involved in the Palestine question. The positions of Jordan, Israel, and the United States on whether the Palestinians should be a party to talks in Geneva or whether they should be allowed to speak in a General Assembly debate on the Palestine question are obviously related. The result is to deny the Palestinians a voice in discussing an issue that touches them directly as human beings attached to a territory occupied and controlled by other states. It is certainly realistic to question the capacity of the UN to deal effectively with the problem of Palestinianism; but one may question with much more justification the capacity of the Israelis, Jordanians, and the United States to deal effectively with the matter—that is to bring about results that can involve the Palestinians in a responsible way.

More basically, it is still fair to ask in today's world whether the Palestinians have any claim to exercise the right of self-determination, whether it was intended they should exercise that right when Partition was voted in 1947, whether actions since that time change the basic juridical status of the territory and the peoples involved. Application of UN resolutions will always require compromise, and so far as I know the UN has not dissolved any of its resolutions on the Palestine question.

The general attitude of the United States toward Palestinianism has been publicly stated on many occasions since the Partition of Palestine in 1947. We have given much lip service to the various UN resolutions that have been voted over the decades. We have never failed to vote for reaffirmation of the right of the Palestine refugees to repatriation and compensation. It is possible to pick and choose among statements, but the United States Government in my view has made it clear that it sees Palestinianism as a force that must be involved constructively in any peace agreement between the Arab states and Israel. American spokesmen have frequently alluded to the "legitimate interests and aspirations" of the Palestinians.

What seems to have eluded American statesmen and indeed the world at large is how to bring about effective consideration of those legitimate interests and aspirations. Who decides what is legitimate or illegitimate? Why should we believe that Jordan or Israel will accord full and sympathetic consideration to the legitimate interests and aspirations of Palestinians? The historical record unfortunately shows that neither Jordan nor Israel can be expected to approve the establishment of a Palestine national entity whatever its label in land now occupied by either Jordan or Israel. One must seriously question therefore the recent policies of the United States, specifically the emphasis being placed on assigning to Jordan and Israel the primary voice for determining Palestinian interests in a settlement of West Bank territorial issues. It is absurd to pretend that Hussein or the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan can speak for the Palestinians as a group. It is the tragedy of Palestinianism that it had not had a moderate and responsible spokesman. But it is preposterous to argue that Hussein is an acceptable substitute spokesman.

There are no simple answers to the question of who can or should speak for the Palestinians, but by not allowing the Palestinians to speak for themselves we tend to force them into more and more immoderate positions. It is no exaggeration to say that Western policies in the Middle East during the past twenty-five years have generally obstructed the development of an effective Palestinian consensus. In fact that obstructionism has been deliberate. This has been most notably true in the case of Jordan which from 1948 until 1967 controlled the area of former Palestine called the West Bank as an integral and formally annexed part of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. The Palestinians living in this area did not like the rule of the Hashemites any more than they liked the previous rule of the British or the present rule of the Israelis who have occupied the West Bank since 1967.

Yet the United Kingdom and the United States for two and a half decades have supported the Hashemite Kingdom with one of the highest per capita levels of military and economic assistance that has been extended to any country of the world. This comparatively massive Western support of Jordan had been justified on grounds that Jordan has exhibited a moderate attitude towards working toward peace with Israel and that Jordan must be supported against the designs of its more radical Arab neighbors. Yet the much-touted Jordanian moderation did not stand in the way of an utterly irresponsible use of the Jordanian Army against Israel in 1967 or other less significant instances of misuse of the military forces before and since. By maintaining the garrison state of Hashemite Jordan in the manner we have supported it, we have mainly satisfied royal vanity and enabled the Hashemite establishment to suppress Palestinian restiveness when it has become too assertive to suit Jordanian interests.

Continued, unrestricted support of Jordanian pretensions to speak for the Palestinians, even those on the East Bank of Jordan where they almost outnumber non-Palestinians, can only obstruct the emergence of a moderate and responsible Palestinian consensus. The emergence of such a consensus has always been seen by the Hashemites as a threat to their monarchical survival. But we must recognize that the Hashemites have no historical homeland claims to this area. They were brought in from the Hejaz by the British in 1920, and they have never become welcome guests.

Similarly, United States support of Israeli policy that it will not deal with Palestinians is shortsighted on our part. It is entirely understandable that the Israelis resent dealing with organizations that contain terrorists, but there are a growing number of Israelis who know that the Palestinians must be brought in somehow as responsible parties to a peace settlement. The United States is not helping Israel in the long run by endorsing its refusal to deal with the idea of Palestinianism as a force that is involved in the dispute. Palestinian extremists will have continued justification for their terrorism in the popular Arab mind if the moderates are frustrated by what appear to them to be stone wall barriers to the possibility of compromise.

WHY IS THE PROBLEM OF PALESTINIANISM STILL UNRESOLVED?

I maintain it is because individual states have been allowed to make their own special interpretations of solutions proposed by the UN. The individual parties have taken it upon themselves to reject UN solutions. And outside powers, as I have described, have supported the individual parties in pursuing their special interpretations. We and the British have supported Jordan. The Soviets have supported Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. We have supported the Israelis. Almost no one has consistently supported the UN as the responsible agency to effect compromise and resolution of the conflict.

Therefore, I think it is essential on this UN day to insist that Palestinianism is properly a problem of the United Nations. We must insist that the Palestine question cannot be left to a few states that will be bound to disregard Palestinian interests in the outcome. Palestinianism, in short, is too important to be left only to Israel and Jordan.

If Palestinianism is a United Nations problem, can we suggest a prescription for a solution? How can anyone know what most Palestinians would settle for in contrast to the extreme demands of some of the feckless or the surrounding Arab states? I would suggest the following prescription:

—The Palestinians, wherever they now live, must be given a real choice between being repatriated to their homeland or being resettled with compensation—a choice which the UN in principle has repeatedly guaranteed to them.

—Land is important to the Palestinians. It is a symbol of sovereignty with deep cultural overtones. Therefore, Palestine repatriation or resettlement with compensation will involve territorial satisfactions to some degree.

—Palestinians generally are fed up with being exploited by the other Arab states. In some ways they resent this political exploitation as much as they fear alleged Zionist expansionism. They therefore dream of some kind of separate Palestine political status that will protect their identity as Palestinians. They do not want to be second-class citizens in Jordan or Lebanon or wherever they may now reside.

Finally, Palestinians like any other human being deeply want security and stability and a chance to achieve their own modernist-reformist aspirations with their own political and social institutions. It is unlikely they will wish to live subordinate to another state such as Jordan or Israel. Thus, they will need an alternative to living in Israel or Jordan.

I believe that a reasonable Palestinian consensus can develop around these prescriptions—a consensus that will consist of Palestinians speaking for themselves, a consensus that would effectively engage Palestinian aspirations in a just and lasting Arab-Israeli political settlement under the auspices of the United Nations. It cannot develop if we continue deliberately to obstruct it.

Let us hope that some progress in this direction can be made next month in the General Assembly.

PROTESTS ON BEHALF OF UNESCO

Mr. CASE, Mr. President, this week, in passing the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974, Congress acted to withhold funds to support, directly or indirectly, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization until the President certifies to the Congress that such organization has adopted policies which are fully consistent with its educational, scientific and cultural objectives and has taken concrete steps to correct its recent actions of a primarily political character.

Since adopting its reprehensive resolutions on Israel at the UNESCO general conference meeting in Paris, many thousands of scholars, artists, intellectuals and professionals have voiced their own independent protest and have decided to not participate in UNESCO under the circumstances.

I ask unanimous consent that three such protests, one in the Philadelphia area and another from Harvard University and one from New Jersey be printed in the RECORD to show the extent of feeling both in the United States and in other countries as well.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
December 12, 1974.

Hon. CLIFFORD P. CASE,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The appended list of academicians from Philadelphia area universities have approved the following resolution:

"We protest the degradation of UNESCO.

"As Professors of diverse disciplines in the Universities of the Philadelphia region, we are dedicated to the universality of educational, scientific and cultural programs. These pursuits seek to unite, uplift, and improve the condition of all people. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization was the primary international agency for these purposes. In common with other humanitarian agencies of the United Nations, UNESCO rigorously rejected political involvement, which is antithetical to its purposes. Until now.

"Israel has been excluded summarily from all regional divisions under which UNESCO world activities are organized.

"UNESCO subventions to Israel for educational, scientific, and cultural projects have been terminated. Ironically, such subventions simultaneously have been offered to the PLO, which participated as invited observers in the actions excluding Israel.

"We applaud the protest of a large group of French intellectuals, under the leadership of Jean-Paul Sartre, and of numerous American Nobel laureates and prestigious academics. We join them in their pledge:

"We shall not collaborate with or support the activities of UNESCO so long as it shall continue to betray its avowed principles by acting as an instrument of political aggression."

On behalf of these academicians.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. COREN,

PRINCETON, N.J., December 15, 1974.

DEAR SENATOR CASE: I am writing in reference to your support for the amendment which stops U.S. funds for UNESCO until Israel is readmitted as a full participant of that organization. The following statement of protest against the exclusion of Israel was signed by more than 100 distinguished professors and administrators of Harvard University during the past five days:

"UNESCO is the U.N. organization whose responsibility it is to promote education, science and culture. In the past month, the General Conference of UNESCO has voted to exclude Israel from all of its regional groupings. Alone among the 135 members of UNESCO, Israel is denied the right to full participation in UNESCO activities.

In essence, UNESCO has decided, as the Lebanese delegate proclaimed, that Israel has no place in the world of nations.

The undersigned will henceforth refuse to collaborate with UNESCO until Israel is unconditionally readmitted to full participation."

The list of those signing is attached. As you will see, it includes many persons who are nationally known, and indeed, world famous. I have arranged the names both alphabetically, and by department (within the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences) or by school (e.g., Law and Divinity). I have starred (*) those persons who are chairmen of their departments. No one has signed this statement in an official capacity related to Harvard University.

The persons who signed this statement were contacted by a group of graduate and undergraduate students of Harvard and Radcliffe. They have no organizational affiliation of any kind. I am writing you in my capacity as organizer of the group.

I would like to suggest that you might consider placing this statement, and the list of those who have signed it, in the Congressional Record, as evidence of the widespread support for opposition to the exclusion of Israel from UNESCO.

If you have any questions concerning this statement, please feel free to contact me at my address below.

Thank you for your attention.

Sincerely,

JONATHAN TOMLIN.

To His Excellency, the Secretary of State, HENRY KISSINGER, Senator CLIFFORD CASE, Washington, D.C.

We, the undersigned, residents of Morris and Sussex counties, New Jersey, do hereby lend our support and endorse the following amendment to the 1974 Foreign Aid Bill introduced by Senator Clifford Case. In so doing, we support Senator Case in condemning further reprehensible resolutions concerning Israel and to any similar resolutions by UNESCO aimed at a particular country.

Senator Clifford Case's amendment:

"In 1967, when the old city of Jerusalem came into Israeli hands for the first time since the struggle of 1948-1949, authorities were appalled at the damages done to that ancient city. Of the 35 synagogues that populated the old city, 34 of the synagogues were totally destroyed, including the ancient HURVA synagogue, a landmark in the old city that stood there since the year 1267. The old Jewish synagogue, including those that held the remains of ancient scholars and sages, were desecrated there, in one case, a roadway was constructed across the cemetery grounds. Headstones and markers of the past were crushed and used for paving roads and other purposes. Christians who used to come to the old city were turned away except on Christmas. Moslems living in Israel were not permitted to come to the old sacred city at all.

"Since that time, the situation has changed dramatically. Access to the city for Christians, Moslems, and Jews is not blocked. The holy places of all faiths are maintained by separate administrators of each religious group. "Laws protect all holy places and guarantee the right of celebrants of all faiths to worship as they will.

"Moreover, reconstruction and restoration of all buildings and landmark structures have subsequently taken place, renewing the charm, grace and elegance of all Jerusalem for all peoples. Additionally, archeological studies undertaken with utmost scientific care have begun to piece together the historical and cultural life of the Hebrews, Christians, and Moslems that made the city the holy place it is.

"The offensive resolutions recently adopted by UNESCO must be repealed.

"I am introducing today an amendment to the Foreign Aid Bill which, if adopted, would cut off all U.S. funds to UNESCO until the Secretary of State certifies to the Congress that each resolution passed by UNESCO not of an educational, scientific, or cultural character, has been repealed. This applies to the reprehensible resolutions concerning Israel and to any similar resolutions aimed at a particular country.

December 19, 1974

"This is severe action, but an action I hope the Congress will endorse. We want to preserve, not destroy, the fabric of our system of international organizations. None of us can stand by and watch American money and talent being funneled through UNESCO to the PLO. This is an affront to the American taxpayers and to the world community of nations."

NATIONAL GROWTH POLICY EMPLOYMENT ACT

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, on May 21, 1973, I introduced a bill to guarantee jobs to all who need them and to assist communities in attracting and maintaining an industrial base by providing for a land-banking program. At a time when our unemployment rate has reached 6.5 percent and may well go higher than ever before in postwar history, a time when 6 million working men and women are unemployed, I think it is appropriate to bring this piece of legislation before the Senate again and recommend it to the attention of my colleagues over the adjournment period.

Title I of S. 1857 would provide a job for every able-bodied American in need. In essence this "full employment" title assures that anyone who cannot find a job in the private sector will have access to a public sector job. These will not be transitional jobs, nor will they be make-work jobs. Instead, they will be jobs which will help translate the social concerns of government into concrete action. They will be jobs in which workers can take pride in their accomplishments.

As chairman of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am well aware of a most shameful aspect of the unemployment picture. Many of the unemployed are veterans. Men torn from careers in formation, pulled away from jobs and normal lives, sent to Indochina, and then returned to a society that offers them no place. This is nothing short of a national disgrace. However, this bill will guarantee that special preference is given to the hiring of Vietnam and Korean veterans who served after 1964.

For the past 35 years, we have assumed that the answer to a high rate of unemployment was either tax reductions or additional Government spending. Inevitably, both of these approaches have failed. Although there has been increasing recognition of structural unemployment and the marked skill imbalances in the economy, most economists have supported monetary and fiscal policy as the main tools to assure full employment and price stability. What is needed is a new approach.

The current policies of the administration, to the extent that there are any current policies of the administration, are the result of confusion rather than concern. While the administration engages in an academic interdepartmental debate about appropriate economic policies, 6 million American workers are suffering the disgrace and deprivation of unemployment. The policies which have been announced by the administration will not succeed in lowering prices and holding back inflation; nor will they succeed in lowering unemployment or preventing it from rising to record levels.

It is time that we broke with the misguided policies of the past and adopted a new economic game plan which will give us full employment without substantial inflation. By full employment I do not mean a 5 percent rate of unemployment or even a 4 percent rate, but something close to zero long-term unemployment.

Another smaller but equally significant group of unemployed are highly skilled but, because of changes in national priorities or unfair competition from abroad, have lost their jobs and are unable to find new ones.

Experience has made it clear that the private sector cannot expand to provide jobs for these millions of able-bodied unemployed without, at the same time, causing inflation. The answer lies in creating new public sector jobs—jobs financed by the Federal Government and provided at the Federal, State, and local levels.

Some may say that the cost for these new jobs will be excessive but such critics forget that we are already paying the unemployed through unemployment insurance and welfare programs. By paying the able-bodied unemployed for socially useful work, we can enhance the moral fiber of the Nation, stabilize and invigorate the economy.

The continued growth of a technology-intensive society promises to leave millions of Americans with obsolete skills and no prospects of meaningful employment. This situation seems so needless and wasteful when there are so many unemployed public needs crying for manpower. This title will provide many middle-aged Americans with new hope, start millions of young people on the road to productive lives, and assure our returning veterans of full membership in the society that sent them off to war.

Title II on urban employment and national growth amends the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965. It helps cities to set up land banks. The banks would consist of land purchased by municipalities for resale to manufacturing plants and business enterprises that otherwise might move from central cities leaving their workers behind. An analysis of nonresidential building permits reveals that in the last 5 years approximately 70 percent of all metropolitan industrial building were constructed outside of the central cities. Another study has found that during the past 5 census years, the suburbs of the 40 largest metropolitan areas gained 85 percent of the new jobs in manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade and related services. In these same areas, 99 percent of the new manufacturing jobs developed in the suburbs. This means that the jobs requiring the lowest skills and paying the lowest salaries are leaving the city, while the white collar firms remain.

Officials in several cities have been trying to set up land bank proposals on their own but have found it difficult. Urban unemployment is a tremendous problem, and our effort needs new direction. Not only must we provide for public service jobs, but we must insure that those jobs that are available in the private sector are not taken away. Thus, title II focuses on the main problem confronting firms that must expand, but find that it is uneconomical to do so inside the central city where a major drawback is the high cost of land. This land has been expensive because it is scarce and also because structures on it often must be demolished.

Under this title, city administrators aided by Federal loans and grants would embark on an aggressive program of identifying and buying parcels of land that are likely to be in demand for industrial expansions. The city would develop the land and hold it for resale. Out of the $450 million cash reserve set aside by Congress, a city would obtain loans covering up to 90 percent of the purchase price of the land. The money could also be used for demolition. Corporations could borrow for construction and purchase of equipment. Certain conditions would have to be met to make the city or corporation eligible for the low-cost loans, including compliance with title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 covering employment discrimination. A separate reserve of $50 million would be used to make grants to cities only, covering up to 25 percent of the project cost.

This program will be a self-sustaining program for the most part. The city would repay the Federal Government out of proceeds of land resale. The grants would be used primarily to make up the loss, if any, that a city might incur in selling land.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 1857 be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Growth Policy Employment Act of 1973".

TITLE I—FULL EMPLOYMENT AND NATIONAL GROWTH Statement of purposes

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) to attain the objective of the Employment Act of 1946 "to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power" it is necessary to assure an opportunity for a gainful, productive job to every American who seeks work and furnish the education, training and job placement assistance needed by any person to qualify for employment consistent with his highest potential and capability;

(2) the United States has the capacity to provide every American who is able and willing to work, full opportunity, within the framework of a free society, to prepare himself for and to obtain employment at the highest level of productivity, responsibility, and remuneration within the limits of his abilities;

(3) the balanced growth of the Nation's economic prosperity and productive capacity is limited by the lack of sufficient skilled workers to perform the demanding production, service, and supervisory tasks necessary to the full realization of economic abundance for all in an increasingly technical society, while, at the same time, there are many workers who are working below their capacity and who, with appropriate education and training, could capably perform jobs

requiring a higher degree of skill, judgment, and attention;

(4) the placement of unemployed or underemployed workers in private employment is hampered by the absence of a sufficient number of appropriate employment opportunities;

(5) there are great unfilled public needs in such fields as health, community improvement, education, transportation, public safety, recreation, environmental quality, conservation, and other fields of human betterment and public improvement, which can be met by expansion of public sector employment opportunities providing meaningful jobs for unemployed and underemployed persons, including those who have become unemployed as a result of shifts in the pattern of Federal expenditures;

(6) economic prosperity and stability in the United States and the well-being and happiness of its citizens will be enhanced by the establishment of a comprehensive full employment program designed to assure every American an opportunity for gainful employment; and

(7) while there is an immediate national interest in an efficient and comprehensive means of guiding the Nation's growth and while the rapid growth of the Nation's population, a deteriorating environment, increasing urban sprawl, large-scale industrial growth, conflicts in patterns of land use, the fragmentation of government entities, and the increased size, scale, and impact of private and public actions have created a situation in which growth policy management decisions of national, regional, statewide, and local concern are often being made on the basis of expediency, tradition, short-term economic consideration, and other factors which detract from the real concerns of a sound national growth policy and are detrimental to the future well being of the Nation; first priority should be given to providing employment and job stability to those who have the greatest needs.

SEC. 102. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Labor;

(2) "State" includes the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands; and

(3) "city" means an incorporated municipality, or other political subdivision of a State, having general governmental powers.

Authorized appropriations

SEC. 103. (a) For the purposes of carrying out this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, unless enacted in specific limitation of this subsection, any funds appropriated to carry out this Act which are not obligated prior to the end of the fiscal year for which such funds were appropriated, shall remain available for obligation during the succeeding fiscal year, and any funds obligated in any fiscal year may be expended during a period of two years from the date of obligation.

Allocation of funds

SEC. 104. (a) Funds appropriated pursuant to this Act for any fiscal year shall be allocated in the following manner:

(1) Not less than 80 percentum shall be apportioned by the Secretary among the States in an equitable manner, taking into consideration the proportion which the total number of unemployed persons, and of persons heading low-income families and unrelated low-income persons, in each such State bears to such total numbers, respectively, in the United States.

(2) The remainder shall be available as the Secretary deems appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) The amount apportioned to each State under clause (1) of subsection (a) shall be apportioned among areas within each such State in an equitable manner taking into consideration the proportion which the total number of unemployed persons in each such area bears to such total numbers, respectively, in the State. To the maximum extent appropriate, apportioned funds for each such area shall be expended through approved applications submitted by prime sponsors.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make reallocations for such purposes under this Act as he deems appropriate of the unobligated amount of any apportionment under subsections (a) (1) and (b) to the extent that the Secretary determines that it will not be required for the period for which such apportionment is available. Any funds reallocated under this subsection are not required to be apportioned in accordance with subsection (a) (1) or (b), and no revision in the apportionment of the funds not so reallocated shall be made because of such reallocations.

(d) As soon as practicable after funds are appropriated to carry out this Act for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall publish in the Federal Register the apportionments required by subsections (a) (1) and (b) of this section.

Financial assistance

SEC. 105. The Secretary shall enter into arrangements with eligible applicants in accordance with the provisions of this Act in order to make financial assistance available for the purpose of providing employment for unemployed and underemployed persons in jobs providing needed public services.

Eligible applicants

SEC. 106. Financial assistance under this Act may be provided by the Secretary only pursuant to applications submitted by eligible applicants who shall be—

(1) public agencies and institutions of the Federal Government;

(2) public agencies and institutions of States and cities; and

(3) Indian tribes and any private nonprofit agencies and institutions approved by the Secretary for the purpose of this Act.

Eligible participants

SEC. 107. Eligibility for participation in any program under this Act shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of this Act authorizing such program; and persons who or persons heading families who receive benefits under title IV of the Social Security Act, or food stamps or surplus commodities under the Agricultural Act of 1949 and the Food Stamp Act of 1964, shall be included among individuals eligible to participate in programs assisted under the provisions of this Act.

Application

SEC. 108. (a) Financial assistance under this Act may be provided by the Secretary for any fiscal year only pursuant to an application which is submitted by an eligible applicant and which is approved by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of this Act. Any such application shall set forth a public service employment program designed to provide employment and, where appropriate, training and manpower services related to such employment which are otherwise unavailable, for unemployed and underemployed persons in such fields as health care, public safety, education, transportation, maintenance of parks, streets, and other public facilities, solid waste removal, pollution control, housing and neighborhood improvement, rural development, conservation, beautification, and other fields of human betterment and community improvement.

(b) An application for financial assistance for a public service employment program under this Act shall include provisions setting forth—

(1) assurances that the activities and services for which assistance is sought under this Act will be administered by or under the supervision of the applicant, identifying any agency or agencies designated to carry out such activities or services under such supervision;

(2) a description of the area to be served by such programs, and a plan for effectively serving on an equitable basis the significant segments of the population to be served, including data indicating the number of potential eligible participants and their income and employment status;

(3) a description of the methods to be used to recruit, select, and orient eligible participants, including specific eligibility criteria, and programs to prepare the participants for their job responsibilities;

(4) a description of unmet public service needs and a statement of priorities among such needs;

(5) description of jobs to be filled, a listing of the major kinds of work to be performed and skills to be acquired, and the approximate duration for which participants would be assigned to such jobs;

(6) the wages or salaries to be paid participants and a comparison with the prevailing wages in the area for similar work;

(7) the education, training, and supportive services (including counseling, medical care, and family planning) which complement the work performed;

(8) the planning for and training of supervisory personnel in working with participants;

(9) a description of career opportunities and job advancement potentialities for participants;

(10) appropriate arrangements with community action agencies, and, to the extent appropriate, with other community-based organizations serving the poverty community, for their participation in the conduct of programs for which financial assistance is provided under this title;

(11) and indication of the full participation and maximum cooperation among local public officials, area residents, and representatives of private organizations in the development of the program and a description of their respective roles in the conduct and administration of the program; and

(12) such other assurances, arrangements, and conditions, consistent with the provisions of this Act, as the Secretary deems necessary, in accordance with such regulations as he shall prescribe.

Application of applications

SEC. 109. An application, or modification or amendment thereof, for financial assistance under this Act may be approved only if the Secretary determines that—

(1) the application meets the requirements set forth in this Act;

(2) an opportunity has been provided to the Governor of the State to submit comments with respect to the application to the Secretary; and

(3) an opportunity has been provided to officials of appropriate cities to submit comments with respect to the application to the Secretary.

Special conditions

SEC. 110. (a) The Secretary shall not provide financial assistance for any program under this Act unless he determines, in accordance with such regulations as he shall prescribe, that—

(1) the program will result in an increase in employment opportunities over those which would otherwise be available and will not result in the displacement of currently employed workers (including partial displacement such as a reduction in the hours of non-overtime work or wages or employment benefits), and will not impair existing contracts for services or result in the substitution of Federal for other funds in connection with work that would otherwise be performed;

(2) persons employed in a public service job under this Act shall be paid wages which shall not be lower than whichever is the highest of (A) the minimum wage which would be applicable to the employment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, if section 6(a)(1) of such Act applied to the participant and if he were not exempt under section 13 thereof, (B) the State or local minimum wage for the most nearly comparable covered employment, or (C) the prevailing rates of pay in the same labor market area for persons employed in similar public occupations;

(3) all persons employed in a public service job under this Act will be assured of workman's compensation, retirement, health insurance, unemployment insurance, and other benefits at the same levels and to the same extent as other employees of the employer and to working conditions and promotional opportunities neither more nor less favorable than such other employees enjoy;

(4) the provisions of section 2(a)(3) of Public Law 89-286 shall apply to such agreements;

(5) the program will, to the maximum extent feasible, contribute to the occupational development or upward mobility of individual participants;

(6) every participant shall be advised, prior to entering upon employment, of his rights and benefits in connection with such employment; and

(7) special consideration in filling public service jobs will be given to unemployed or underemployed persons who are military veterans of the Vietnam Era, as defined in section 101 of title 38, United States Code (and who have received other than dishonorable discharges); and that the applicant shall (a) make a special effort to acquaint such individuals with the program, and (b) coordinate efforts on behalf of such persons with those authorized by chapters 41 and 42 of title 38, United States Code (relating to job counseling and employment services for veterans) or carried out by other public or private organizations or agencies.

(b) Where a labor organization represents employees who are engaged in similar work in the same labor market area to that proposed to be performed under any program for which an application is being developed for submission under this Act, such organization shall be notified and afforded a reasonable period of time in which to make comments to the applicant and to the Secretary.

(c) The Secretary shall prescribe regulations to assure that programs under this Act have adequate internal administrative controls, accounting requirements, personnel standards, evaluation procedures, and other policies as may be necessary to promote the effective use of funds.

Additional limitations and conditions

Sec. 111. (a) Any amounts received under chapters 11, 13, 31, 34, and 35 of title 38, United States Code, by any veteran of any war, as defined by section 101 of title 38, United States Code, who served on active duty for a period of more than one hundred and eighty days or was discharged or released from active duty for a service-connected disability or any eligible person as defined in section 1701 of such title, if otherwise eligible to participate in programs under this Act, shall not be considered for purposes of determining the needs or qualifications of participants in programs under this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall not provide financial assistance for any program under this Act unless he determines, in accordance with regulations which he shall prescribe, that periodic reports will be submitted to him containing data designed to enable the Secretary and the Congress to measure the effectiveness of all programs. Such data shall include, but be not necessarily limited to, information on—

(1) enrollee characteristics, including age, sex, race, health, education level, and previous wage and employment experience;

(2) duration in previous training and employment situations, if any;

(3) total dollar cost per person, including breakdown between salary or stipend, supportive services, and administrative costs. The Secretary shall compile such information on a State, regional, and national basis.

(c) The Secretary shall not provide financial assistance for any program under this Act unless the grant, contract, or agreement with respect thereto specifically provides that no person with responsibilities in the operation of such program will discriminate with respect to any program participant or any applicant for participation in such program because of race, creed, color, national origin, political affiliation, physical disability, or beliefs.

(d) The Secretary shall not provide financial assistance for any program under this Act which involves partisan political activities; and neither the program, the funds provided therefor, or personnel employed therein, shall be, in any way or to any extent engaged in the conduct of partisan political activities in contravention of chapter 15 of title 5, United States Code.

(e) The Secretary shall not provide financial assistance for any program under this Act unless he determines that participants in the program will not be employed on the construction, operation or maintenance of so much of any facility as is used or to be used for sectarian instruction or as a place for religious worship.

Administrative provisions

Sec. 112. (a) The Secretary may prescribe such rules, regulations, guidelines, and other published interpretations or orders under this Act as he deems necessary. Such rules, guidelines, regulations, and other published interpretations or orders may include adjustments authorized by section 204 of the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968.

(b) The Secretary may make such grants, contracts, or agreements, establish such procedures, and make such payments, in installments and in advance, or by way of reimbursement, or otherwise allocate and expend funds made available under this Act, as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, including (without regard to the provisions of section 4774(d) of title 10, United States Code) expenditures for construction, repairs and capital improvements, and including necessary adjustments in payments on account of overpayments or underpayments. The Secretary may also withhold funds otherwise payable under this Act in order to recover any amounts expended in the current or immediately prior fiscal year in violation of any provision of this Act or any term or condition of assistance under this Act.

(c) The Secretary is authorized, in carrying out his functions and responsibilities under this Act, to accept in the name of the Department, and employ and dispose of in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, or any title thereof, any money or property, real, personal, or mixed, tangible or intangible, received by gift, devise, bequest, or otherwise.

(d) The Secretary is authorized, in carrying out his functions and responsibilities under this Act, to accept voluntary and uncompensated services, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3679(b) of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 865(b)).

(e) The Secretary is authorized to accept and utilize in carrying out the provisions of this Act funds appropriated to carry out other provisions of Federal law if such funds are utilized for the purposes for which they are specifically authorized and appropriated.

(f) In addition to such other authority as he may have, the Secretary is authorized, in carrying out his functions under this Act, to utilize, with their assent, the services and facilities of Federal agencies without reimbursement, and with the consent of any State or political subdivision of a State, accept and utilize the services and facilities of the agencies of such State or subdivision without reimbursement.

(g) The Secretary is authorized, in carrying out his functions under this Act, to expend funds without regard to any other law or regulations for rent of buildings and space in buildings and for repair, alteration, and improvement of buildings and space in buildings rented by him only when necessary to fulfill the purposes of this Act and subject to prior written notification to the Administrator of General Services (if the exercise of such authority would affect an activity which otherwise would be under the jurisdiction of the General Services Administration) of his intention to exercise such authority and the reasons and justification for the exercise of such authority.

Sec. 113. (a) For the purpose of affording adequate notice of funding available under this Act, appropriations under this Act are authorized to be included in the appropriations Act for the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year for which they are available for obligation.

(b) In order to effect a transition to the advance funding method of timing appropriation action, the amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply notwithstanding that its initial application will result in the enactment in the same year (whether in the same appropriation Act or otherwise) of two separate appropriations, one for the current fiscal year and one for the succeeding fiscal year.

Transfer of funds

Sec. 114. Funds appropriated under the authority of this Act may be transferred, with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, between departments and agencies of the Federal Government, if such funds are used for the purposes for which they are specifically authorized and appropriated.

Labor standards

Sec. 115. All laborers and mechanics employed in any construction, alteration, or repair, including painting or decorating of projects, buildings, and works which are federally assisted under this Act, shall be paid wages at rates not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality as determined by the Secretary in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Act, as amended (40 U.S.C. 276a-276a-5). All others shall be paid at a rate not less than the then prevailing Federal minimum wage. The Secretary shall have, with respect to such labor standards, the authority and functions set forth in Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (15 F.R. 3176; 64 Stat. 1267) and section 2 of the Act of June 1, 1934, as amended (48 Stat. 948, as amended; 40 U.S.C. 276(c)).

Cooperation of other agencies

Sec. 116. Each department, agency, or establishment of the United States is authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary and, to the extent permitted by law, to provide such services and facilities as he may request for his assistance in the performance of his functions under this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall carry out his responsibilities under this Act through the utilization, to the extent appropriate, of all possible resources for skill development available in industry, labor, public and private educational and training institutions, State, Federal, and local agencies, and other appropriate public and private organizations and facilities, with their consent.

Advisory committee

Sec. 117. (a) The Secretary shall appoint an Advisory Committee on Public Service Employment which shall consist of at least thirteen but not more than seventeen members and shall be composed of persons representative of labor, management, agriculture, education, economic opportunity programs, as well as representatives of the unemployed. From the members appointed to such Committee, the Secretary shall appoint a Chairman. Members shall be appointed for terms of three years except that (1) in the case of initial members, one-third of the members shall be appointed for terms of one year each and one-third of the members shall be appointed for terms of two years each, and (2) appointments to fill the unexpired portion of any term shall be for such portion only. Such Committee shall hold not less than two meetings during each calendar year.

(b) The Advisory Committee shall—

- (1) review the administration and operation of all programs under this Act and advise the Secretary of Labor and other appropriate officials as to carrying out their duties under this Act;
- (2) conduct independent evaluations of programs carried out under this Act and publish and distribute the results thereof; and
- (3) make recommendations (including recommendations for changes in legislation) for the improvement of the administration and operation of such programs as are authorized under this Act.

(c) The Advisory Committee shall make an annual report, and such other reports as it deems necessary and appropriate, on its findings, recommendations, and activities to the Secretary and to the Congress.

(d) The Advisory Committee may accept and employ or dispose of gifts or bequests, either for carrying out specific programs or for its general activities or for such responsibilities as it may be assigned in furtherance of subsection (b) of this section.

(e) Appointed members of the Advisory Committee shall be paid compensation at a rate not to exceed the per diem equivalent of the rate for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, when engaged in the work of the Advisory Committee, including traveltime, and shall be allowed travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5703) for persons in Government service employed intermittently and receiving compensation on a per diem, when actually employed, basis.

(f) The Advisory Committee is authorized, without regard to the civil service laws, to engage such technical assistance as may be required to carry out its functions; to obtain the services of such full-time professional, technical, and clerical personnel as may be required in the performance of its duties, and to contract for such assistance as may be necessary.

(g) For the purposes of this section, funds may be reserved from the sums appropriated to carry out this Act, as directed by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

State and local advisory committees

Sec. 118. For the purpose of formulating and implementing programs under this Act, the Secretary may, where appropriate, assist in the establishment of representative advisory committees on a community, State, and regional basis.

Reports

Sec. 119. (a) The Secretary of Labor shall make such reports and recommendations to the President as he deems appropriate pertaining to manpower requirements, resources and use, and his recommendations for the forthcoming fiscal year, and the President shall transmit to the Congress within sixty days after the beginning of each regular session a report pertaining to manpower requirements, resources and use.

(b) The Secretary shall transmit at least annually as part of the report required under this section a detailed report setting forth the activities conducted under this Act.

Interstate agreements

Sec. 120. In the event that compliance with provisions of this Act requires cooperation or agreements between States, the consent of Congress is hereby given to such States to enter into such compacts and agreements to facilitate such compliance, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Effective date

Sec. 121. The effective date of this Act shall be July 1, 1973. Rules, regulations, guidelines and other published interpretations or orders may be issued by the Secretary at any time after the date of enactment of this Act.

TITLE II—URBAN EMPLOYMENT AND NATIONAL GROWTH

Findings and declarations

Sec. 201. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) the harmful economic consequences resulting from the trend of industrial migration from large cities is a matter of critical national concern;

(2) such industrial migration causes a waste of the economic resources in the cities, including serious unemployment in the labor force and an erosion of the tax base of the cities;

(3) to overcome this problem, the Federal Government, in cooperation with the States, should help cities and municipalities to take effective steps in planning and financing economic development in line with balanced national growth;

(4) Federal financial assistance, including grants and loans for development of facilities and businesses in areas needing development, should enable such areas to help themselves achieve lasting improvement and enhance the domestic prosperity by the establishment of stable and diversified local economies, provided that such assistance is preceded by and consistent with sound, long-range economic planning and growth policy planning; and

(5) under the provisions, employment opportunities should be created by developing and expanding new and existing industrial establishments and other facilities and resources rather than by merely transferring jobs from one area of the United States to another.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to authorize the Federal Government to provide a direct program of Federal assistance to municipalities and to private industry to alleviate the wasteful economic disruption and loss resulting from the movement of industrial firms away from the cities.

Sec. 202. The Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE VIII—URBAN INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

"Part A—Grants to central cities for the establishment of urban land banks

"Direct and supplementary grants

"Sec. 801. (a) Upon the application of any central city, as defined in section 833, with a population of one hundred thousand or more, the Secretary is authorized to make direct grants for the purchase and development of real property within such central city, on condition that such real property be employed at a later date for the purpose of industrial development, if he finds that—

"(1) the project for which financial assistance is sought will directly or indirectly—

"(A) tend to improve the opportunities, in the area where such project is or will be located, for the successful establishment or expansion of industrial plants or facilities,

"(B) otherwise assist in the creation of additional long-term employment opportunities for such area, or

"(2) the area for which a project is to be undertaken is suitable in terms of terrain and location for industrial development, and that the costs incurred by the municipality are reasonable in terms of current local property values.

"(b) The amount of any direct grant under this section for any project shall not exceed 25 per centum of the cost of such project.

"(c) Such project may include—

"(1) acquisition of real property and any structures located thereupon;

"(2) demolition and removal of buildings; and

"(3) other improvements necessary to make the land suitable for industrial development.

"(d) A municipality purchasing land with assistance provided under this section may sell, lease, convey, or otherwise use such land, provided that such use is consistent with the purpose of industrial development.

"(e) The Secretary shall prescribe rules, regulations, and procedures to carry out this section which will assure that adequate consideration is given to the relative needs of municipalities that apply for assistance. In prescribing such rules, regulations, and procedures the Secretary shall consider among other relevant factors (1) the severity of the rates of unemployment in the areas eligible for assistance under this title and the duration of such unemployment and (2) the income levels of families and the extent of underemployment in such eligible area.

"(f) Not more than 15 per centum of the appropriations made pursuant to this section in any fiscal year may be expended in any one State in such fiscal year.

"Authorization of Appropriations

"Sec. 802. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out this part not to exceed $50,000,000 per fiscal year for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1974, and for each fiscal year thereafter through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1978.

"Part B—Loans to Central Cities for the Establishment of Urban Land Banks

"Urban Land Bank Loans

"Sec. 810. (a) Upon the application of any central city, as defined in section 833, with a population of one hundred thousand or more, the Secretary is authorized to purchase evidences of indebtedness and make loans to assist in financing the purchase and development of real property within such municipality; on condition that such real property be employed at a later date for the purpose of industrial development, if he finds that—

"(1) the project for which financial assistance is sought will directly or indirectly—

"(A) tend to improve the opportunities in the area where such project is or will be located, for the successful establishment or expansion of industrial plants or facilities,

"(B) otherwise assist in the creation of additional long-term employment opportunities for such area, or

"(C) prevent the loss of existing job opportunities in such area;

"(2) the financial assistance requested for such project is not otherwise available from private lenders or from other Federal agencies on terms which in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the accomplishment of the project;

"(3) the amount of financial assistance requested plus the amount of other available funds for such project are adequate to insure the completion thereof;

"(4) there is a reasonable expectation of repayment;

"(5) the area for which a project is to be undertaken is suitable in terms of terrain and location for industrial development, and that the costs incurred by the municipality are reasonable in terms of current local property values.

"(b) The amount of any loan under this section shall not exceed 90 per centum of the cost of such project.

"(c) Such project may include—

"(1) acquisition of real property and any structures located thereupon;

"(2) demolition and removal of buildings;

"(3) other improvements necessary to make the land suitable for industrial development.

"(d) A municipality purchasing land with assistance provided under this section may sell, lease, convey, or otherwise use such land, provided that such use is consistent with the purpose of industrial development.

"(e) Subject to section 832(2) of this title, no loan, including renewals or extensions thereof, shall be made under this section for a period exceeding forty years, and no evidence of indebtedness maturing more than forty years from the date of purchase shall be purchased under this section. Such loans shall bear interest at a rate not less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods of maturity comparable to the average maturities of such loans, adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum, less not to exceed one-half of 1 per centum per annum.

"(f) The amount of any loan under this section shall not exceed 90 per centum of the cost of such project.

"(g) Not more than 15 per centum of the appropriations made pursuant to this section for any fiscal year may be expended in any one State in such fiscal year.

"Authorization of Appropriations

"Sec. 811. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section: Provided, That annual appropriations for the purpose of purchasing evidences of indebtedness and making and participating in loans shall not exceed $200,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1974, and for each fiscal year thereafter through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1978.

"Part C—Urban Industrial Development Loans

"Business Loans and Loan Guarantees

"Sec. 820. (a) The Secretary is authorized (1) to purchase evidence of indebtedness and to make loans (which for purposes of this section shall include participation in loans) to aid in financing any project within a central city, as defined in section 833 of this title, of one hundred thousand population or more for the purchase or development of land and facilities (including machinery and equipment) for industrial usage, including the construction of new buildings, and rehabilitation of abandoned or unoccupied buildings, and the alteration, conversion, or enlargement of existing buildings; and (2) to guarantee loans for working capital made to private borrowers by private lending institutions in connection with projects in central cities assisted under subsection (a) (1) hereof, upon application of such institution and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe: Provided, however, That no such guarantee shall at any time exceed 90 per centum of the amount of the outstanding unpaid balance of such loan.

"(b) Financial assistance under this section shall be on such terms and conditions as the Secretary determines, subject, however, to the following restrictions and limitations:

"(1) Such financial assistance shall not be extended to assist establishments relocating from one area to another or to assist subcontractors whose purpose is to divest, or whose economic success is dependent upon divesting, other contractors or subcontractors of contracts theretofore customarily performed by them, except that such limitation shall not be construed to prohibit assistance for the expansion of an existing business entity through the establishment of a new branch, affiliate, or subsidiary of such entity if the Secretary finds that the establishment of such branch, affiliate, or subsidiary will not result in an increase in unemployment of the area of original location or in any other area where such entity conducts manufacturing operations, unless the Secretary has reason to believe that such branch, affiliate, or subsidiary is being established with the intention of closing down the operations of the existing manufacturing entity in the area of its original location or in any other area where it conducts such operations.

"(2) The project for which financial assistance is sought must be reasonably calculated to provide more than a temporary alleviation of unemployment or underemployment within the area wherein it is or will be located.

"(4) Subject to section 832(2) of this title, no loan, including renewals or extensions thereof, may be made hereunder for a period exceeding thirty years and no evidences of indebtedness maturing more than thirty years from date of purchase may be purchased hereunder, except that these restrictions on maturities shall not apply to securities or obligations received by the Secretary as a claimant in bankruptcy or equitable reorganization or as a creditor in other proceedings attendant upon insolvency of the obligor.

"(5) Loans made and evidences of indebtedness at a rate not less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum, plus additional charge, if any, toward covering other costs of the program as the Secretary may determine to be consistent with its purpose.

"(6) Loan assistance shall not exceed 90 per centum of the aggregate cost to the applicant (excluding all other Federal aid in connection with the undertaking) of acquiring or developing land facilities (including machinery and equipment), demolition and removal of structures, and of constructing, altering, converting, rehabilitating, or enlarging the building or buildings of the particular project, and shall, among others, be on the condition that other funds are available in an amount which, together with the assistance provided hereunder, shall be sufficient to pay such aggregate cost.

"(7) Such assistance shall be extended only to applicants which have been approved for such assistance by an agency or instrumentality of the central city thereof in which the project to be financed is located, and which agency or instrumentality is directly concerned with the problems of industrial development in such central city.

"(8) To the extent the Secretary finds such action necessary to encourage financial participation in a particular project by other lenders and investors, any Federal financial assistance extended under this section may be repayable only after other loans made in connection with such project have been repaid in full, and the security, if any, for such Federal financial assistance may be subordinated and inferior to the lien or liens securing other loans made in connection with the same project.

"Sec. 821. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out this part not to exceed $250,000,000 per fiscal year for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1974, and for each fiscal year thereafter through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1978.

"Sec. 830. (a) No land for the acquisition of which a grant, loan, or other financial assistance has been made under this title shall be converted to uses not originally approved by the Secretary without his prior approval. Prior approval will be granted only upon satisfactory compliance with regulations established by the Secretary. Such regulations shall require findings that (1) there is adequate assurance that the substitution of another project of as nearly feasible equivalent usefulness, location, and fair market value at the time of the conversion; (2) the conversion and substitution are needed for orderly growth and development, and (3) the proposed use of the substituted project meets with the criteria established by the Secretary under this title.

"(b) If application is made for conversion under subsection (a), the Secretary may modify the terms of the grant or loan agreement as he sees fit, taking into account the degree by which the municipality or manufacturing firm benefited by purchasing the land pursuant to this title, the alternate land use which such municipality or manufacturing firm proposes, and any other relevant factors. Such modification of the agreement may include establishing an earlier repayment date for a loan, or repayment by the municipality of any grant received. The Secretary, after consulting with the municipality, may similarly modify the terms of the agreement if the land purchased remains vacant for an unreasonable length of time as determined by the Secretary.

"Sec. 831. The Secretary is authorized to make grants, loans, and other financial assistance to municipalities under this title in any combination he deems necessary except that the total of all financial assistance under this title shall not exceed 100 per centum of the total project cost (excluding all other Federal aid in connection with the undertaking).

"(1) under regulations prescribed by him, to assign or sell at public or private sale, or otherwise dispose of for cash or credit, in his discretion and upon such terms and conditions and for such consideration as he shall determine to be reasonable, any evidence of debt, contract, claim, personal property, or security assigned to or held by him in connection with loans made or evidences of indebtedness purchased under this title, and collect or compromise all obligations assigned to or held by him in connection with such loans or evidences of indebtedness until such time as such obligations may be referred to the Attorney General for suit or collection;

"(2) to further extend the maturity of or renew any loan made or evidence of indebtedness purchased under this title, beyond the periods stated in such loan or evidence of indebtedness or in this title, for additional periods not to exceed ten years, if such extension or renewal will aid in the orderly liquidation of such loan or evidence of indebtedness;

"(3) deal with, complete, renovate, improve, modernize, insure, rent, or sell for cash or credit, upon such terms and conditions and for such consideration as he shall determine to be reasonable, any real or personal property conveyed to, or otherwise acquired by, him in connection with loans made or evidences of indebtedness purchased under this title;

"(4) pursue to final collection, by way of compromise or other administrative action, prior to reference to the Attorney General, all claims against third parties assigned to him in connection with loans made or evidences of indebtedness purchased under this title. This shall include authority to obtain deficiency judgments or otherwise in the case of mortgages assigned to the Secretary. Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (41 U.S.C. 5), shall not apply to any contract or hazard insurance or to any purchase or contract for services or supplies on account of property obtained by the Secretary as a result of loans made or evidences of indebtedness purchased under this title if the premium therefor or the amount thereof does not exceed $1,000. The power to convey and to execute, in the name of the Secretary as a result of loans made or evidences, assignments and satisfactions of mortgages, and any other written instrument relating to real or personal property or any interest therein acquired by the Secretary pursuant to the provisions of this title may be exercised by the Secretary or by any officer or agent appointed by him for that purpose without the execution of any express delegation of power or power of attorney;

"(5) acquire, in any lawful manner, any property (real, personal, or mixed, tangible or intangible), whenever deemed necessary or appropriate to the conduct of the activities authorized by this title;

"(6) in addition to any powers, functions, privileges, and immunities otherwise vested in him, take any and all actions, including the procurement of the services of attorneys by contract, determined by him to be necessary or desirable in making, purchasing, servicing, compromising, modifying, liquidating, or otherwise administratively dealing with or realizing on loans made or evidences of indebtedness purchased under this title;

"(7) employ experts and consultants or organizations thereof as authorized by section 55a of title 5, compensate individuals so employed at rates not in excess of $100 per diem, including traveltime, and allow them, while away from their homes or regular places of business, travel expenses (including per diem in lieu of subsistence) as authorized by section 73b-2 of title 5 for persons in the Government service employed intermittently, while so employed, except that contracts for such employment may be renewed annually;

"(8) sue and be sued in any court of record of a State having general jurisdiction or in any United States district court, and jurisdiction is conferred upon such district court to determine such controversies without regard to the amount in controversy; but no attachment, injunction, garnishment, or other similar process, mesne or final, shall be issued against the Secretary or his property. Nothing herein shall be construed to except the activities under this title from the application of sections 507(b) and 2679 of title 28 and section 316 of title 5; and

"(9) establish such rules, regulations, and procedures as he may deem appropriate in carrying out the provisions of this title.

"Sec. 833. When used in this Act the term 'central city' shall mean that governmental unit within each Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area designated and defined as such by the Office of Management and Budget."

OIL AND ANTITRUST

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, when I introduced the Petroleum Act of 1973 (S. 2165), I stated that enactment of this legislation, which would reorganize the petroleum industry into competing units of manageable size would reestablish the viability of competition at each level.

Now, Mr. Angus McDonald, former legislative and research director of the National Farmers Union, has stated in a paper presented to the Midwest Electric Consumers Association:

Divestiture would not involve any disruption of production, refining, transportation or distribution facilities. Separating ownership and control of the different segments of the oil industry would increase efficiency with resultant benefits to independents and consumers.

Mr. McDonald presents a comprehensive, fully substantiated argument in support of divestiture in the petroleum industry as the only means of restoring the spirit of free enterprise, the vitality of free competition, and the necessity of reasonable prices for both consumers and independent sectors of the industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. McDonald's cogent analysis of the need for decisive Government antitrust action with respect to the petroleum industry be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

OIL AND ANTITRUST (By Angus McDonald) I. THE OIL OLIGOPOLY

The eighteen largest integrated oil companies are inextricably bound together by: Oil and gas leases; Joint business ventures; Joint ownership of production facilities; Joint ownership of pipelines and other transportation facilities; Vertical integration from point of production to point of consumption;

Horizontal integration of thousands of distribution facilities which results in control of markets and division of territories; 132 interlocks with banks and other financial institutions;

46 affiliations with educational institutions; and 224 interlocks with manufacturing and distributing corporations.

Seven firms produce 70 percent of the so-called free world's oil production. Twenty-three major oil firms control 85 percent of refining capacity in the United States, 72 percent of natural gas production, 75 percent of the gasoline retail market and 50 percent of uranium reserves. Five of the fifteen companies that control approximately 75 percent of the sale of coal are oil companies.

Dominant firms are the same in both oil and gas production. In 1956 the top natural gas producers were among the top fifteen oil producers and among the top seventeen oil refiners. The top ten interstate natural gas suppliers were Exxon, Amoco, Shell, Gulf, Phillips, Mobil, Texaco, Union, Atlantic Richfield and Continental. Fourteen years later they were the same except that Atlantic Richfield and Continental had become bigger by merger.

One of the most conspicuous evidences of oligopoly activity is the practice of four or more of the major oil companies to submit joint bids for onshore and offshore United States leases. The system of bidding administered by the Department of Interior has become a cartel device which shuts out the independents. Three or four or a half dozen of the giants are allowed to submit a single bid which involves putting up a large sum initially which is beyond the capability of any independent or group of independents. This system rather than one entirely based on royalties was evident in the oil shale bidding. Bids which did not include the payment of a bonus in advance were thrown out. Such a system does not differ materially from one of explicit collusion which is illegal under the antitrust laws.

Government policies relating to offshore leases have ruled out participation by independents. In 1967 Secretary of Interior Stewart Udall encouraged independent producers to offer recommendations as to how independents could participate in offshore operations. Subsequently the Texas Independent Producers and Royal Owners Association submitted a proposal:

"It is recommended that the U.S. Dept. of Interior set aside an undivided acreage interest equivalent to 10 percent of the acreage in each federal offshore tract made available for competitive bidding by independent producers and royalty owners, as defined by the Small Business Administration." (Hearings before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, August 1, 1970, p. 1951.)

Clinton Engstrand, Vice President of the Texas Independent Producers and Royalty Association, says that Interior was not serious about trying to prevent a monopoly in offshore development. "We received only a kiss-off in the form of a letter from the Assistant Secretary for Mineral Affairs asking, 'Does the small independent really need or want Federal intervention to get into the offshore game?'"

It was contended that the leasing law prevented allocation of a share of federal leases to small producers. Actually the Department is given wide discretionary power in the disposal of federal petroleum leases.

Joint bids and common conspiratorial action on government contracts is a way of life in the oil industry. In December, 1971, the Department of Justice published data indicating that U.S. oil companies submitted more identical bids relating to Federal, State and local government contracts than any other business group. Leading the list were: Armour Oil, Atlantic Richfield, British Petroleum, Cities Service, Continental Gulf, Mobil, Shell, Standard of California, Standard of Ind. and Union, John Mitchell, Attorney General, assured the oil companies that submitting identical bids "does not imply wrong doing on their part."

Although the Clayton Act of 1914 forbids competing corporations from having common Directors there is nothing in the law which prevents two or more competing corporations from having common directors on the Board of a third corporation unless a lessening of competition may or will result. There is a multiplicity of oil directors serving on the Board of Directors of the largest banks in the U.S. A total of nine oil directors representing seven oil giants are connected with the Chemical Bank of N.Y. Four of them are directors and five are members of advisory committees. Sitting on the Board of the Bank of America are directors of the Board of Standard of Calif., Continental, Getty and Union. Chase Manhattan Bank has four oil men on its Board representing Exxon, Mobil, Continental, Atlantic Richfield and Standard of Ind. First National City Bank has three oil men (Mobil, Phillips and Shell). Morgan Guaranty Trust is connected with Exxon, Atlantic Richfield, Cities Service and Continental.

Oil company directors who are directors of banks and other corporations form a cozy and exclusive club where it is convenient for them to reach understandings and agreements which result in common if not conspiratorial action. Oil company interests in large banks, particularly where a relatively large number of oil men are bank directors would find it easy to reach tacit agreements in violation of the antitrust laws. It is difficult to imagine how they could carry on their day to day financial transactions involving bidding, investments, interest rates and all kinds of deals without involving antitrust violations.

Federal Power Commission studies indicate that all the major oil companies are not only connected by indirect interlocks and bidding practices but with joint ownerships. In the Permian basin in Tex. and in the state of La. the eighteen largest oil companies have a multitude of joint ownerships. Fourteen of the eighteen have five or more interlocks with the other seventeen. Continental has 28 joint ventures with Atlantic, 27 with Cities Service, 27 with Getty, 16 with Mobil, 13 with Exxon and 11 each with Amoco and Sun.

Uncommitted gas reserves throughout the U.S. for the most part are held by only a few of the major integrated oil companies. In the Permian basin eight companies own 94 percent of the gas reserves. Eight companies own 98 percent of the onshore gas leases, 74 percent of the offshore gas reserves leased by the state, and 100 percent of those leased by the federal government. In Alaska eight companies own 99.9 percent of the gas reserves leased.

The proposed Alaska pipeline is to be built by a consortium of oil companies. Ownership will be divided as follows: British Petroleum 28%, Atlantic Richfield 28%, Exxon 25.5%, and Amerasia-Hess 3%. William J. Lamont, antitrust attorney, who resigned in disgust after Attorney General John Mitchell pulled him off the proposed Alaska case in a letter to Senator Haskell said that "the joint venture arrangements for production and transportation of Alaskan oil give three companies, which are already substantial factors in domestic U.S. crude oil production, joint control over the marketing. . . . Two of the three companies involved are also major factors in world production outside the U.S. (Standard of N.J. and British Petroleum). . . . control over the pipeline and the related production agreements will give to three companies operating virtually as one monopoly control over the marketing of oil on the West coast and a greater share of domestic oil production than would be permissible under any view of the antitrust laws." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 119, pt. 18, p. 23568.)

The Alaska pipeline should be called the Japanese-Alaska pipeline since much of the oil will probably go to Japan. Senator Mondale and other midwest Senators lost their fight to have a pipeline built through Canada which would bring oil to North Dakota, Minnesota and other states which desperately need the oil. There are no pipelines crossing the Rocky Mountains and there is no economically feasible way to bring the oil to the midwest.

The Prudoe Bay field in Alaska has 10 or more billion barrels of proven reserves, 55 percent of which are owned by British Petroleum. Atlantic Richfield owns 20 percent and Exxon 20 percent. These reserves will be exhausted in a few years with a standard 48 inch pipeline carrying 2 million barrels a day.

A vice president of British Petroleum said: "Say in 1980 you have got 1.8 million bbls. a day coming out of that field. Say West coast demand is about 1.2 million, you have got 400,000 or 500,000 or 600,000 barrels a day surplus. We have to decide what is in our best interest. . . . It's a matter of indifference, from the oil company's point of view whether we sell it to Japan or the West Coast." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 119, pt. 18, p. 23569.)

II. THE INTERNATIONAL OIL CARTEL

Outside the United States control over the Petroleum Industry (including reserves, production, refining, transportation and marketing) is divided between state monopolies and seven large international petroleum companies. These seven companies are: Standard Oil of N.J., Standard Oil of Calif., Texaco, Gulf, Mobil, British Petroleum and Shell.

Arthur Dean, Attorney for Standard Oil of New Jersey, in urging that documents be withheld from a grand jury investigating the international oil cartel, said in 1952: "If it were not for the question of national security we would be willing to face either a criminal or a civil suit. But this is the kind of information that the Kremlin would love to get its hands on."

One of the documents kept from the grand jury was the Federal Trade Commission's study of the International Petroleum Cartel which had been released to the public. All the Kremlin had to do to get a copy was to send one of the agents down to the publications division of the FTC which was giving out copies to all on a first come first served basis. The cartel study was never a classified document. Quite the contrary. Economists John Blair and Bill Johnson and Commissioner John Carson wanted the document distributed as widely as possible. The statement of Arthur Dean was a smoke screen thrown up to convince the public that enforcement of the antitrust laws would endanger national security.

A careful reading of the cartel study convinced many including Dept. of Justice attorneys that the Sherman and Clayton Acts had been and were being violated. Prices had been fixed first by requiring all those who bought oil to pay the Houston, Texas, price plus freight cost to Houston. Buyers of Mid-East oil paid imaginary freight to Houston. This system was resisted. As a result a second basing point was set up in the Persian Gulf which required purchasers to pay freight either to the Persian Gulf or to Texas whichever was closer. The result was almost the same as under the single basing point arrangement. Fictitious freight rates resulted in identical prices at any given point. Thus competition was eliminated. Buyers paid phantom freight if the oil they purchased was produced at points closer to them than either basing point. If the oil was produced at a place farther away than either basing point the seller absorbed freight and only charged freight to the closest basing point.

As can be imagined there was resistance to the basing point system both in its first and second phases. The British, for example, had to pay phantom freight to a basing point on purchases of oil produced at locations as close as 200 miles away. The result was a phantom freight charge equal to the cost of transporting the oil many hundreds of miles. Thus under the dual point basing system phantom freight and freight absorption were often involved.

A congressional investigation in 1948 indicated that the Navy which was bringing oil from the Arabian-American Co. for delivery to the French Government under the Lend-Lease Act was paying excessive prices. The cost of Saudi-Arabia oil was $4.1 a barrel including royalty of $.21. The Navy was paying $1.05. Finally mid-east prices and Texas Gulf prices were equalized at a point in the United Kingdom.

The FTC cartel study formed the basis for the antitrust division of the Dept. of Justice's attempt to indict Jersey Standard, Calif. Standard, Texas and Socony-Vacuum (now Mobil). The companies claimed the suit endangered national security. While paper shuffling was going on in the Dept. of Justice the State Dept. was promising the companies antitrust immunity if they would take care of Premier Mossadegh, who had nationalized Iranian oil.

Even President Truman was subverted by oil company pressure. He offered to dismiss the grand jury and substitute a civil suit if the companies would promise to turn over the subpoenaed documents. The companies refused. They knew that John Foster Dulles, partner of Arthur Dean, was scheduled to be Secretary of State under Eisenhower.

The Eisenhower Administration hastily dismissed the grand jury investigation and the civil suit floundered. The oil companies kept saying national security would be endangered and the Administration agreed. The National Security Council put its foot down and forbade any attempt to break up the cartel.

In 1960 a consent decree settlement with Gulf and Jersey Standard was announced the day after Senator O'Mahoney was assured there was no intention of Justice to settle the case. O'Mahoney was furious and threatened to sue but nothing came of it. Texaco agreed to a consent settlement in 1963; in 1967 the case against Standard and Mobil was dismissed without prejudice.

On Jan. 15, 1971 Justice issued a secret business review letter giving the oil companies immunity from prosecution in their joint bargaining with the organization of petroleum exporting companies. Justice said this was done to protect the smaller companies from being discriminated against by the OPEC. The agreement was announced by the so-called Big Eight and the independents were advised their interests would be represented by Jersey Standard and British Petroleum.

The purpose of the joint bargaining session is clear. Prices were fixed and both the oil cartel and the OPEC countries were stronger and the independents (natural enemies of the cartel in the U.S.) were weakened. Thus competition was dealt a blow both at home and abroad by the Justice Dept. which was supposed to enforce competition. To wrap things up the Dept. of Justice issued another business review letter to allow the majors to pool their oil if Libya got out of line. Senator Proxmire said that was a violation of the 1960 consent order and that the Justice Department's denial was Orwellian double talk.

One attorney said Justice had no choice. Arthur Dean was running things. "He marched into Attorney General Mitchell's office with the Defense Dept. under one arm and the State Dept. under the other" and presented the head of the Justice Dept. with the pooling agreement. Antitrust immunity was necessary to prevent the Arabs from cutting off oil supplies.

Mark Green compares this agreement with what happened after Nasser took over the Suez Canal in 1956. (The Closed Enterprise System, Grossman, N.Y. 1972, p. 217.) Immunity was granted under the Defense Production Act which provided for government participation in oil company decisions and required approval of both the Justice Dept. and the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. When the group met to work out the arrangements the State Department representatives were asked to wait outside.

All these agreements and waivers of antitrust laws, exclusion of elected and appointed antitrust law enforcers from decision making meeting underlines the fact that the real managers of foreign policy which concern oil are the oil companies. The Dept. of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission and various regulatory agencies had no more real power over the oil companies than Charlie McCarthy had over Edgar Bergen.

The oil companies have had their problems with the mid-east countries which have been pressing for a larger share of oil profits. In 1950 or thereabouts oil companies in the Persian Gulf were selling oil for $1.75 a barrel. The cost of production was 20c a barrel. The royalty was 21c, which left $1.34. Royalties were increased to 67c under a 50-50 arrangement. But the increased royalties by a process of transmutation were changed into tax credits against the U.S. Treasury.

The result was that the companies paid the U.S. little or no tax and because of the depletion allowance and intangible expense credits often had a credit arising out of the operation which could be transferable to another operation.

It is important to know that the countries in this bookkeeping operation had no income tax laws. There was no such thing as a barrel on oil when it is taken out of the ground can only be a royalty or when a government seeks a payment on production it is called an excise tax. How can there be an income tax before the oil is sold to a refinery or distributor?

The problem of the oil companies was simple. How could they avoid paying U.S. income taxes? The solution was more complicated. Under our tax laws an American corporation operating in a foreign country is allowed to subtract the income taxes paid in that country from the income taxes he owes the U.S. Treasury. This arrangement seems equitable since if a foreign country had an income tax of say 50 percent, the 48 percent income tax of the U.S. would virtually wipe out all the company's profits. Arrangements have been made with a number of countries by means of treaties which are ratified by the U.S. Senate to determine how much credit a U.S. firm is entitled to when it pays its income taxes in the U.S.

The oil companies solved the problem in this way. They got attorneys in the State and Treasury Departments to employ a little hocus-pocus. They decided to call the increased royalties the sheiks were demanding income taxes. Just to make it look legal the companies sent their Wall Street lawyers to Saudi Arabia to write some laws which defined the added royalty as income taxes.

The oil companies since then have subtracted most of their royalties which they call taxes from U.S. taxes which they would otherwise owe the Treasury. The first year the Treasury lost $50 million from ARAMCO. The Arabian American Oil Co. is a partnership of four oil companies and Saudi Arabia. Calif. Standard, Exxon and Texaco each own 22.5 percent of ARAMCO, Mobil owns 7.5 percent and Saudi Arabia 25 percent.

Recently the Saudis have announced that they are taking over 100 percent of the ownership of ARAMCO. This should not affect the existing owners though it should benefit smaller oil companies. "Until now there has been a wide differential, ranging from $1 to $4 a barrel, between the prices paid by the smaller concerns for mid-east crude and the cost of the oil to the international companies that produced it." (Wall Street Journal, Dec. 6, 1974.)

Nobody knows how much taxes the U.S. lost from other companies. Nobody knows how much money the Treasury has lost since then. And nobody knew about the negotiations which resulted in this arrangement because all the discussions, memoranda and decisions were top secret. The documents were classified. Even the documents originating in the Joint Committee on Taxation were classified.

But we know that since then the oil companies have paid little or no income taxes. We know now about the machinations of the oil companies and the officials we pay to look after the interest of the American taxpayer. The oil companies do have a problem even though government agencies have fixed it so they can avoid paying income taxes. They have so many tax credits they don't know what to do with them. They have the tax credits referred to. They have the depletion allowance. They have the intangible expenses which they can deduct as a tax credit instead of an expense. And they have the accelerated depreciation credit and the privilege of carrying tax credits they don't use back two years and forward several years.

The only mystery is why the oil companies pay any taxes at all. As former Ambassador

McGhee outlined the situation the increased royalties (called taxes) went to Saudi Arabia and other mid-east countries instead of the U.S. Treasury. The oil companies made the same profit as before. In effect the U.S. Government was a tax collector for the mid-east countries. Senator Church called the situation an absurdity. (Hearings, Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, Jan. 1974, Part 4, pp. 83-102.)

The effect of the Mid-east tax benefits and the depletion allowance has been to discourage the building of refineries in the U.S. The depletion allowance was supposed to encourage development. But why should the oil companies produce oil in the U.S. when they can develop cheap oil in the Mid-east and get the depletion allowance there too. And why should it build refineries on which there is no depletion allowance. But one large refinery has been built in the eastern part of the U.S. (where most oil and gas is consumed) since 1950.

It is easy to see why it is to the advantage of the oil companies to keep gross profits high on crude oil production and profits low on the refining part of their enterprises. Keeping profits low on refining discourages the building of refineries by the independents who might compete with them in distribution. Having a bottle-neck on distribution enables the oil companies to operate in a scarcity situation or the illusion of scarcity. The major oil companies do not usually sell to independent refineries, nor do their refineries usually sell to independent distributors. In this way they can control the volume and the price of crude and its by-products from point of production to point of consumption.

For the last several years the main problem of the oil companies has been to try to contain in some way the increased demands of the oil producing countries in the Mid-east. One of the most obstreperous of these countries was Libya which demanded drastic price increases in 1971. The oil companies' reaction was to call once more on their willing servants in the Justice and State Departments.

In early 1971 Dudley Chapman of the Antitrust Division of the Dept. of Justice and James E. Atkins, Chief of Fuels and Energy in the State Dept., huddled in an anteroom of a Wall Street office while the oil executives conferred inside. The government officials were there because it was necessary that they agree in advance to whatever violations of the antitrust laws the oil companies agreed on. Antitrust laws were waived without Congress or anyone else knowing about it and a few days later John J. McCloy, an old State Department man, flew down to Washington to put the final touches on the agreement which is still a classified document. The Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, headed by Senator Church, is trying to find out if the earlier control of production by the oil companies was a major policy error leading to today's crisis.

The adverse effect of oil company manipulation on U.S. consumers of oil and gasoline was recently revealed by the Subcommittee. The New England Petroleum Corporation battled unsuccessfully in 1973 two major oil companies and the State Department when it attempted to bring oil and its by-products into the U.S. during the period of extreme shortage. The result of the struggle was a stiff increase in the fuel bills by millions of consumers in New York and New England. (Washington Post, Feb. 19, 1974.)

New England Petroleum Corporation's (NEPCO) troubles began in Sept. 1973 when Libya seized 51 percent of the properties of Standard Oil of Calif. (SoCal.) NEPCO and SoCal jointly owned a refinery in the Bahamas and SoCal was under a long term contract to supply NEPCO with Libyan crude. After the seizure SoCal decided to get tough and told NEPCO it was suspending delivery of oil from Libya. Thus NEPCO would have no oil from the Bahama refinery and would lose its share of the ownership since SoCal had guaranteed the financing. NEPCO was the chief supplier of Consolidated Edison of New York and other utilities in the northeast which produced electricity by means of oil for 20 million people.

NEPCO was forced to negotiate its own deal with Libya and had to charter its own tankers since SoCal refused to deliver the Libyan oil it was trying to boycott. On September 13, 1973 Laurie W. Folmar, a Vice Pres. of Texaco, called NEPCO and threatened legal action. He said that his company owned the Libyan oil and that NEPCO had no right to buy and transport it. In minutes after the Texaco call H. A. Nevis, a Vice President of SoCal also called and threatened legal action. A half hour later Frank A. Mau of the State Department's office of Fuel and Energy called NEPCO and also made threats. He said that legal action would be taken to preserve the rights of the two companies and that there would be repercussions in the Middle East.

Richard de Manning, legal counsel for NEPCO, appeared before the Church Subcommittee and told this story. Manning appealed to Secretary of State Kissinger but apparently he was in accord with the action of his employees. Nothing happened except that the price of low sulfur Libyan crude jumped from $4 to $17. Fuel prices to utilities served by NEPCO jumped 74 percent and the increase was passed on to consumers.

III. THE SHORTAGE

The Church hearings brought into public view the result of the dragon's teeth sowed by oil executives and a supine government. From 1962 to 1968 three of the Aramco owners: SoCal, Texaco and Mobil, joined with Gulf in Iran to hold down production and production capacity. Owners agreed to impose financial penalties on any owner which takes or "lifts" oil in excess of its ownership share. Despite oil industry claims that it has been warning of an impending oil shortage Aramco did not significantly expand until 1970. (Senate Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations, March, 1974; Washington Post, Mar. 28, 1974.)

There have been many charges that the oil companies engineered the oil shortage of 1973. Regardless of the truth of these charges the motivation for keeping oil in short supply is evident. There is also evidence that the oil companies benefited directly from the exorbitant price increases of the oil producing countries in the Mid-east. Profits per barrel of oil increased from 62¢ in 1963 to $1.23 to $1.25 in most of the embargo period of 1973 and to almost $2 in the post embargo period and to $4.50 by April 1974. (IBID)

At the hearings of the Multinational Subcommittee, Senator Church asked Senator Joseph J. Johnson, Senior Vice President of Aramco, what incentive Aramco and its owners had to press for lower prices. Johnson was unable to think any incentive. Profits of the oil companies increased in the same proportion as the Mid-east countries increased their share of the price of the oil. During the so-called crisis the Mid-east share was increased by 350 percent; and the profits of Aramco increased by 350 percent. Aramco's 1973 cash flow was $8.7 billion, the largest in history for a single firm in international commerce. In 1973 it paid $2,397,000 in taxes or less than .1 of 1% of profits.

The oil companies have attempted to lay the entire blame for high prices on the Mid-east oil producers. The situation today is curious and unique. One of the Mid-east producers is attempting to come to the aid of American consumers exploited by the oil companies. The Shah of Iran has proposed a new system which would benefit consumers by $1.60 a barrel and reduce the profits of oil companies from $2 a bbl. to 50¢ per bbl. Mid-east countries have been souring on the oil companies for some time. Khone Abderrahman, Secretary General of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Companies, said that OPEC is blamed for world-wide skyrocketing prices but that big oil companies were responsible. He accused U.S. oil companies of making "windfall profits." "We never took the first step in raising prices," he said.

The Shah of Iran, probably the best friend American consumers have in the oil community, called attention many months ago to the duplicity of the oil companies. (New York Times, Feb. 24, 1974.) In February of this year (1974) he suggested that big oil companies had caused the gasoline shortage in order to increase their profits. He insisted that as much oil was coming into the country as before the embargo. Although the Shah's statement was an exaggeration recent figures indicate there is a good deal of truth in what he said. Figures released by the Commerce Department indicate that crude oil exports from most Arab countries were heavy in the first two months after the embargo was imposed on October 16, 1973. (Wall Street Journal, April 9, 1974.)

Critics wondered why domestic oil production declined during and before the Arab embargo. Saudi Arabia continued to export oil to the U.S. during the embargo though in smaller quantities. Some suspected a plot between the Arabs and the oil companies because imports increased before the embargo actually ended. (Wall Street Journal, June 13, 1974.)

Robert B. Stobaugh of the Harvard University Business School told Senator Church's Subcommittee that Americans were hit twice as hard as Europe and Japan during the embargo. (Washington Post, July 26, 1974.) He said that the American companies did not favor their home countries. In February, for example, when the crunch in the U.S. was the worst, other countries' supplies had bounced back to pre-embargo levels.

Some thought it strange that supplies of oil were plentiful during the embargo. Interior Department statistics showed that U.S. crude oil stocks on Dec. 14, 1973 stood at 251.2 million barrels, three million bbls. more than a year earlier.

Christopher Rand, a Middle East oil specialist, called the shortage a manipulation. In articles in Dec. 1973, Harpers Magazine, and the Washington Post of Jan. 1974, he said there was no oil shortage in December and no gasoline shortage in January 1974. He said refinery capacity in the U.S. was 13.33 million barrels a day which could be compensated by the capacity of 3.65 million barrels a day of refineries in the Caribbean owned by oil giants, including Texaco, Shell, Gulf and Exxon. Caribbean and domestic refinery capacity he said totaled more than 17 million bbls. leaving a U.S. shortage of about 500,000 bbls. a day. This could be amply compensated by stocks which, he said, stood on Dec. 2 at 513.7 million barrels.

In July 1974 the American Petroleum Institute reported that major refiners were cutting back on gasoline production because high prices had driven down demand. (Washington Post, July 31, 1974.) Refineries were operating at 6 to 7 percent below the capacity utilized a year earlier. Dr. Fred C. Alline of Georgia Tech., a recognized authority on petroleum, said it was the purpose of the majors to keep the supply of gasoline relatively tight in order to keep prices high.

M. B. Holdgraf of the Independent Gasoline Marketing Council, in June 1973 (Washington Star-News, July 29, 1974) during the height of the oil shortage and before the oil embargo, told the Hart Committee that independent refineries were 50 percent idle and that if they could have obtained adequate supplies of crude oil there probably would have been no shortage. Yet the major oil companies were telling the American people that lack of refining capacity caused the shortage.

Holdgraf said: "... the major oil company refiners may indeed have used up major oil company refining capacity or close to it. But in the Midwest, in the William Brothers pipeline system ... points along the gulf coast and along the west coast, where independent refineries, who sell to independents, or class of trade such as ourselves, are running up to 50 percent short of capacity. ... As a result we are told of not being able to have crude available to them, especially the inland refiners, the land locked refiners ... and also surprising as it may be the independent refiners who are on the coast. ... 300,000 bbls. of refining capacity (are) available to process crude. And this is very ironic to us, who headquarter in the Midwest to see refineries of independents along a pipeline system not using their capacity, when the farmers, the transcontinental truckers, public services, ambulances, fire departments ... are being denied a product. ...

"It is also very difficult to understand why in the State of Kansas and surrounding State of Oklahoma where crude oil is available and pumping out of the ground next to the refineries these refineries cannot put their hand on sufficient crude to run their operations. ...

"I am thinking in terms of 2 and 1/2 or 3 or 4 percent of the product—very near what I think is the short fall of the Nation at this point in finished product."

Senator Hart: "And could these refineries, if they had crude available to them in your judgment, make up for whatever shortage may be at the moment?"

Holdgraf: "Very close to it." (Hearings before the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, June 12, 1973, p. 149.)

There has been a good deal of speculation in regard to the wholesale cancellation of contracts and the removal of certain companies from retail and wholesale markets which they had been supplying over a long period of years. Questions have been asked as to where the gasoline went which was suddenly shut off and why the majors suddenly shut off old branded stations and then installed secondary gasoline outlets in the same market area. Questions have been asked why contracts with schools, municipalities and other government entities were suddenly cancelled. The complaints of those operating owned or leased major stations would fill volumes and the complaints by the independents about the squeeze in supplies would fill more volumes.

During the last several years the country has been flooded with propaganda about the necessity for decontrolling the price of natural gas supposed to be controlled by the Federal Power Commission. Testimony before Senator Hart's antitrust subcommittee indicate that there is a concerted effort by the oil companies to force Congress to decontrol natural gas. All during the embargo and before and after wells were capped and gas was withheld from the market. Hundreds of wells were shut down in the natural gas rich Gulf of Mexico while the oil companies were spending millions to advertise claims they were working overtime to end the crisis. Forty percent of the wells in the Louisiana Gulf area were said to be capped. 880,000 acres of federal domain of oil and gas leases in the Gulf of Mexico were classified as idle or "producing shut in." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 12, 1974) Senator Hart has characterized the gas shortage as a "hoax". James T. Halverson, director of the Bureau of Competition, said that his investigations showed that U.S. gas reserves in some areas were as much as 1,000 percent higher than those reported by the industry. Procedures he said used by the American Gas Assn. and utilized by the FPC "could provide the vehicle for a conspiracy to under report gas reserves."

There have been rumblings for years in Congress and among consumer groups that the FPC was conniving with the oil and gas companies and related groups to hoodwink the public about both oil and gas reserves. Protests were heard when in 1971 the FPC appointed executives of the industry to make a gas survey which was to be labeled confidential. This followed a report by a House Subcommittee which severely censured the FPC for granting multibillion dollar rate increases based on highly disputed data.

In April 1974 Senator Proxmire accused the American Petroleum Institute of grossly understating oil reserves. The API claimed that reserves had declined by a billion barrels when in fact according to Proxmire they rose by many billions of barrels. So called proved reserves are equal to the amount of oil that can be economically produced under existing costs and prices. Because of skyrocketing prices the Senator reasoned that the amount of proved reserves must have increased. Proxmire called the API estimate outrageous and said it was based on the ridiculous assumption that prices would drop by half. "This is about as likely as assuming the sun will rise in the West tomorrow." (Washington Star News, April 7, 1974.)

Complaints about the maladministration of the Natural Gas Act by the Federal Power Commission developed into a public uproar and a demand by Congressman John Moss that the General Accounting Office investigate. In a letter to Elmer Staats, Comptroller General, Moss asked that GAO look into the apparent effort of the FPC Chairman Naskas to repeal the Natural Gas Act by paying no attention to Congressional policy as set forth in the Act and interpreted by the Supreme Court. The court in the famous Phillips case said that the FPC must regulate the price of natural gas sold in interstate commerce.

Moss was especially exercised over the Belco Petroleum case in which the FPC had authorized a 73 percent increase in the price of natural gas. He said that similar increases would cost consumers at least $1 billion a year. The Belco case said Moss set the stage for a "most astonishing performance in memory by a regulatory commission." "On Sept. 14, 1973, without any public notice or allowing interested parties to comment, the FPC effectively decontrolled natural gas prices for six months." Moss also asked that GAO look into the apparent effort of FPC to sabotage a Federal Trade Commission investigation of monopoly practices in the oil and gas industry. To get action on FPC maladministration Moss went to court petitioning the U.S. Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to determine whether FPC had the power to repeal in effect the Natural Gas Act by its apparent illegal decisions.

Moss was aided in his efforts by the Consumers Union of the U.S. which sought Judicial review of the Belco case. The Consumer Federation of America also entered the court battle on Sept. 21, 1973. In Oct. 1974 Judge David Bazelon of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia set aside the natural gas increase which the FPC had authorized for Belco. Belco it appears was a part of the Tenneco oil complex. The gas was to be sold by Belco to Tenn. Gas Pipeline Co., a division of Tenneco, Inc. Belco was also a division of Tenneco. In other words Tenneco was selling natural gas to itself and the new high price was to be charged to consumers.

This situation is not uncommon in the petroleum industry. Major oil companies own intrastate gas not subject to regulation. Interstate gas and intrastate is often produced by the same company. Intrastate producers sell gas not subject to regulation at exorbitant prices not only to enhance their profits but to call attention to the high intrastate prices and relatively low interstate prices. It should be emphasized that producers under regulation are generally allowed a net profit of 15 percent.

The argument for decontrol is that it would stimulate production of natural gas and relieve the shortage. Higher prices would not necessarily make more gas available. A Library of Congress study says that freeing new gas wouldn't do more than produce higher prices. The effect of decontrol would be stupendous and contribute to inflation. In Nov. 1974 Congressman Moss released the study made by the Library which concluded that decontrol might cost consumers $75.6 billion over a period of six years. Both Nixon and President Ford have urged that natural gas be decontrolled. Higher prices in an industry where half a dozen companies control does not usually produce additional production. Coal prices more than doubled or tripled in the last year or two yet production has not increased. The same has been true of oil. Where an industry is concentrated prices are purposely kept high for obvious reasons. Increased production which might cause prices to fall result in a situation which is feared much more than government regulation.

The result of the General Accounting Office investigation was a devastating exposure of the subversion of the Natural Gas Act by the Federal Power Commission. The Commission did not even pay attention to its own regulations. For a year there were no minutes kept of official meetings. Important decisions were transmitted by word of mouth and conflicts of interest were common throughout the agency. Only seven of 125 officials had filed their financial forms as required and a number had participated in decisions affecting companies in which they held stock. Officials were found to hold stock in numerous mammoth corporations they were supposed to regulate. Included among these were Exxon, Union, Standard of Indiana, Northern Ill. Gas, Occidental Petroleum, Monsanto, Washington Gas Light, Tenneco and Atlantic Richfield. (Comptroller General of the U. S. Need for Improving Regulation of Natural Gas Industry, Sept. 13, 1974, p. 36.)

So flagrant and illegal has been the conduct of the FPC that employees were caught in the act of burning records by Senator Hart's antitrust subcommittee. The FPC over a period of several years had apparently attempted to throw obstacles in the way of the Federal Trade Commission which was investigating the oil companies. It had denied the Commission the right to see or copy even under a promise of confidentiality the result of a natural gas survey and had attempted to prevent the FTC from compiling information by saying it would cost $25,000 to get the information by means of computers. The FTC, the most starved agency in Washington, had no funds for such a purpose finally got the information at a cost of $150 or $200. An FTC employee who attempted to sabotage the FTC investigation resigned and to a fat job at the Federal Power Commission. His huge salary increases were apparently a reward for his loyalty to those interests who did not want an investigation. The complete facts will never be known of the FPC role in the destruction of documents, the concealment of reserves, the close relation between FPC and the oil and gas companies. Unfortunately no records or tape recordings exist of their probably overt and tacit conspiracies.

During all the commotion over concealment of oil and gas reserves, capping of wells, fixing of prices, manipulation and withholding of supplies the Dept. of Justice remained as always oblivious to violations of the antitrust laws. Impediments on interstate commerce in restraint of trade are violations of the Sherman Act as are conspiracies. Countless discriminations, mergers and punitive action against independents in violation of the Clayton Act were also ignored.

IV. THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, STATE ATTORNEY GENERALS AND THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The Federal Trade Commission castigated unfairly by Ralph Nader and his associates several years ago moved in June 1973 to check the power of eight of the largest integrated oil firms. The complaint charged that Exxon, Gulf, Mobil, Standard Oil of Calif., Standard Oil of Ind., Shell and Atlantic Richfield joined to monopolize refining of crude oil into petroleum products and maintain and reinforce a non-competitive market structure. The FTC contended that American consumers were forced to pay higher prices than they would have paid in a competitive market and that actual and potential competition had been "hindered, lessened, eliminated and foreclosed." (FTC Docket No. 8934) The FTC also accused the eight companies with causing shortages in areas where the independents were located. As a result independent marketers were forced to close.

Previously the Commission had issued a complaint against the Phillips Petroleum company on May 14 and against the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio on Jan. 18. Standard of Ohio was charged with fixing prices and Phillips was charged with dealer coercion, illegal tie ins, market foreclosure to competitors and surveillance and control of dealer operations.

The suit against the eight major oil companies was regarded as the biggest antitrust case in history. Congressman Moss called it the most significant antitrust litigation since the Standard Oil trust was broken up in 1911.

Those sympathetic to the oil companies moved almost immediately. The House Appropriations Committee acted to deny the FTC the $1,014,000 requested by the agency. However as a result of protests the House restored the funds.

Despite approval of funds the case against the big oil companies seems to have bogged down. The staff charges that cumbersome rules make it impossible to get subpoenas expedited. Under the FTC rules the side seeking a subpoena must show that it is necessary and that its purpose couldn't be accomplished by voluntary methods. Another factor is the refusal of the companies to obey a subpoena. In this and other cases the oil companies have either ignored subpoenas or refused to honor them.

At the Senate Antitrust Judiciary Committee hearings on June 8, 1973 Senator Kennedy said: "Two years ago the FTC requested data from the major oil companies for its study. Monday, 18 months after it issued subpoenas for that information, the Justice Dept. announced it will seek to enforce subpoenas that require submission of that data. We waited a year and a half for the Justice Dept. to act on a legitimate request for the information for the Federal Trade Commission ... nor do we have any evidence that the Justice Dept. itself is concerned about the antitrust implications of the recent marketing practices of the major companies." (Senate Antitrust Subcommittee Hearings, June 1973, p. 3)

Prospects for expedition of the FTC case are not good. Donald R. Moore, Administrative Law Judge, said: "The commission may want to consider as an alternative, the withdrawal of this case from adjudication—that is, dismissal without prejudice—so that it may be more fully investigated without the restrictions imposed by existing rules." (Washington Post, Nov. 1, 1974)

Another battle of the FTC concerns the attempt of the agency to get information about profits, costs and taxes of the different divisions of the giant corporations. The consolidated returns of statistics of a corporation are sometimes meaningless. Frequently a conglomerate or other type of corporation will take over for tax purposes another corporation which is not making a profit. Losses of the acquired corporation may be credited against taxes paid by the acquiring corporation. Often a corporation will merge with another corporation in order to eliminate competition. The FTC has been trying for years to get a breakdown of consolidated returns which would give it statistics in each separate line of business the corporations are engaged in. Large companies have consistently opposed giving the FTC such information.

When the FTC attempted to seek funds for its line of business survey the companies apparently put pressure on appropriation committees. Despite setbacks on Capitol Hill, the FTC is going ahead with its survey. An Appropriation Committee changed the FTC's request and said it could query only 250 major corporations, halving the FTC's original request to include 500 major corporations in the survey. The House voted in June 1974 to go along with the committee action. However the House did restore a million dollar cut of the Appropriation Committee relating to the antitrust complaint against the eight major oil companies. The FTC has received support for its line of business survey from the General Accounting Office. In May 1974 the GAO advised the FTC that it was not opposed to the survey.

Hamstringing the FTC in its suits and line of business survey have been William Simon, Sec. of the Treasury and Roy Ash, Director of the Budget. Ash it was reported has been seeking legislation which would make it harder to break up companies because they are too big. Ash has opposed the FTC attempt to send out questionnaires to big corporations and has opposed the law passed over President Ford's veto which will make it possible for consumers and interested persons to secure unclassified information under the Freedom of Information Act.

Ash, formerly President of the Litton Corp., has been involved in fraudulently activities. A federal grand jury in San Diego has indicted Litton and four officers in a 121 count fraud suit. Litton was accused in a Superior Court of Los Angeles of overcharging the Air Force by $43.4 millions. Ash it was said made conflicting statements while under oath.

Ash has been involved in antitrust suits for years. In 1971 the FTC in its suit against Litton said Ash's testimony was inconsistent and that it was difficult to determine who was telling the truth. Certain employees of Litton revolted against Ash because they were ordered to "book false information." (Washington Post, Dec. 1973) In one California lawsuit the Litton Co. and Ash were accused of defrauding owners of businesses acquired. Ash has also been involved in dubious legislative activities. He tried to emasculate the FTC by dismembering its antitrust and economic functions. On Capitol Hill he tried to kill the FTC amendment to the Alaska pipeline bill. He made an 11th hour visit to Congressman Melchor and threatened a veto if the FTC amendment was not killed.

William Saxbe, Attorney General, after some of the Ash revelations said: "I don't think it's good to have a president of Litton sitting in the cat-bird seat."

William Simon, now Secretary of the Treasury, is even better known than Ash for his anti-FTC activities. The ink was scarcely dry on the complaint against the big eight when Simon, then Under Secretary of the Treasury and Chairman of the President's Oil Policy Committee acted to stop the suit. He challenged the charge that the major oil companies were not competitive although he later admitted to a congressional committee that "antitrust policy is a little bit out of my line." (Hearings, Senate Judiciary Antitrust Subcommittee, July 1973, p. 347.) This was probably the understatement of the year.

On July 30, 1973, Simon wrote a letter to Lewis A. Engman, Chairman of the FTC, in which he said he found it "difficult to believe that the oil industry is not competitive." Simon went on to say that he would like to meet with Engman "to discuss this matter further and also provide you with our complete comments on the FTC staff recommendations before final Commission action."

On August 10, 1973, Robert J. Lewis, assistant to the Chairman of FTC, answered the Simon letter in which he said that "it would not be appropriate for the Chairman in his judicial capacity to discuss the specific issues which you have raised." What Simon did not understand was that his letter was interference with a quasi-judicial agency. Members of the FTC must act as judges and are prohibited from discussing a pending case. FTC acts as a U.S. District Court. Cases when appealed to the Court of Appeals. Simon's action was highly improper and evoked the kind of response expected. But Simon had gone further. He had authorized a study of his own. (Staff Analysis of the Energy Advisor, Dept. of the Treasury, on the FTC . . . Investigation of the Petroleum Industry)

On August 27, 1973 he released this study to the press apparently in an attempt to try the case in the newspapers. The study was a whitewash of the major oil companies and contained some misrepresentations. For example, the study listed on p. 41 a number of refineries in order to refute the FTC statement that no large refineries had been built in the Eastern U. S. since 1950. Several of the refineries listed manufactured asphalt not gasoline or processed oil and had nothing to do with the shortages. The study also contended that the lack of refineries was entirely the fault of the environmentalists. Actually big oil refused to build refineries years before the protests of the environmentalists has acted in recent years to stop the building of a large refinery in New England.

Simon's main contention was that breaking up the oil companies would disrupt the entire industry. He inferred that separating refining from production would be a disaster.

The history of past divestitures has proved this not to be true. Examples are the Big Oil divestiture of 1911, the meat packer divestiture of the 1920's and the electric power and gas divestitures of the 1930's. Divestiture as an antitrust technique is discussed in the final section of this paper.

About the same time that the FTC issued its complaint against the big eight it also charged a number of oil and gas companies with violation of that part of the Clayton Act that prohibits a person from serving as a director of two competing companies. Named in the proposed complaints were: Standard Oil of Ohio, Diamond Shamrock Corp. and Horace A. Shepard, a member of the Board of both Cleveland companies which the FTC said competed in the sale of oil and gas;

Amerada Hess Corp., Newmont Mining Corp. and William B. Moses;

El Paso Natural Gas Co., Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Corp. and Alfred C. Glassell Jr. and Franz Schneider;

Kerr-McGee Corp., Oklahoma City, Okla. Natural Gas Co. Tulsa and Dean A. McGee; General American Oil Co. of Texas, Dallas; Pauley Petroleum, Inc., Los Angeles and Paul A. Cenley; Dixilyn Corp., Austral Oil Co. and William M. Johnson.

All of these companies and directors were engaged in the business of oil and gas.

Kenneth Anderson, an assistant director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, said that the proposed complaints represented only a miniscule part of what we hope to do." (Wall Street Journal, June 28, 1974.)

More vociferous and active than the FTC against the so-called oil monopoly have been State Attorney Generals. In June 1974 the national district Attorneys' Assn. representing 5,000 members accused major U.S. oil companies of violating state and federal antitrust laws and attempting to acquire control of all the nation's energy resources. The Association after a five months' investigation urged all local district attorneys to initiate antitrust investigations and prosecutions to fill the void resulting from inaction at the federal level in Washington, D.C. The group alleged that the Justice Department was not interested in enforcing antitrust laws against the petroleum industry. The District Attorneys charged nine companies: Exxon, Texaco, Gulf, Mobil, Standard, (Ind.) Standard (Calif.), Shell, Atlantic Richfield and Union with violating laws in seven specific areas involving advertising, interlocking directorships with insurance companies and banks, elimination of competition through acquisitions and mergers, joint ownership of pipelines, joint bidding on oil leases on public lands, destruction of independent retailers and marketers and making exchange agreements that permit only one company to refine a second company's crude oil or supply it with fuel.

These charges by the national group of Attorneys followed filings of antitrust suits against major oil companies in the states of Mass., N.Y., Conn., Fla., and Calif. One of the most vocal of those castigating the oil companies was Daniel S. Dearing, Chief Trial Counsel, who represented the Attorney General of Florida in testimony before the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee on June 8, 1973. He referred to the techniques of the oil companies in violating antitrust laws as: "a strange animal: it has feathers like a duck, webbed feet and a bill like a duck, and it quacks like a duck. When we broil it, garnish it with orange slices, and serve it with wild rice on the business end of an antitrust complaint, it may taste like crow; but for now it isn't too irresponsible to conclude that it is indeed a combination, contract, conspiracy or cartel." (Hearings, Senate Judiciary Antitrust Subcommittee, July 1973, p. 65.) Dearing said that an attorney in the Dept. of Justice had told him that he had been told to "go slow" on antitrust enforcement against the oil companies.

Attorney General Robert K. Killian of Conn. told the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee that he had been "rebuffed outright by the Dept. of Justice . . . This arrogant, let the public be damned is a scandal." Killian was one of those who urged a multi-district federal antitrust suit by cooperating state Attorney Generals. He also was a mover behind the National Association of Attorney General's resolution condemning the Dept. of Justice for its inaction. FTC's response to an appeal was to welcome assistance to State Attorneys and pledge complete cooperation.

Thomas E. Kauper, Assistant Attorney General of the Antitrust Division of the Dept. of Justice, responded to the appeal for help with a letter saying that the activities of the oil companies "may merely manifest parallel behavior by the majors and not the result of an illegal combination." (Ibid, p. 18.)

Killian also was rebuffed by John Dunlop, Director of the Cost of Living Council, who refused to answer his letter. Killian wrote to Dunlop asking for information on the controls to be placed on petroleum prices and how these controls could be enforced and policed in the State of Conn.

Dunlop at the time was busy pushing through a $1 a bbl. increase for oil over the objections of the Council staff and an outside consultant. This increase on "old" domestic oil to $5.25 a bbl. (which cost consumers an estimated $2½ billion a year) was settled on as a compromise by Economic Advisor Herbert Stein who wanted oil to rise to $12 a bbl. William Johnson, Treasury aid, suggested $10 a bbl. and his colleague Oz Brownlee wanted all controls taken off oil prices.

Johnson said in response to Congressional and FTC evidence that proved reserves were understated said that "the notion that industry was falsifying information is part of a paranoid, McCarthyite attitude that is sweeping the country." (Washington Post, Dec. 21, 1973.)

Dunlop also set profit dates for profit margins apparently designed to cripple retailers and add to profit margins of the big oil companies. Senator Jackson wrote Dunlop on July 26, 1973, pointing out that the Jan. 10, 1973 date discriminated against retailers because of price wars and low margins at that time of year.

A few historical examples document the contention that the Dept. of Justice is completely worthless as far as the public interest in regard to oil is concerned. In 1941 twenty-two vertically integrated oil companies and 379 of their subsidiaries were charged by Justice with a number of antitrust violations. Included were price fixing, predatory price wars, basing point delivered pricing, exclusive dealing contracts and other practices. The complaint (U. S. v. Atlantic Refining Co.) called for divestiture of the oil companies' transportation and marketing facilities. The result of these awesome charges was a consent decree in which the companies received a mild slap on the wrist in the form of limiting payments to shipper-owners of pipelines. The complaint was then referred to the Council for National Defense which in turn referred it to an oil advisory committee nine of whose members were connected with Standard Oil or Shell, both defendants. According to Mark Green the oil industry threatened to withhold commitments to the war effort unless the charges were dropped or postponed until after the war. "The decree reflected this blackmail." (The Closed Enterprise System, Grosman, N.Y. 1972, p. 195.)

Another famous case (U. S. v. El Paso Natural Gas Co.) which reflected little credit on the Justice Dept. involved two pipelines. El Paso Natural Gas was the sole supplier of Natural Gas to California in 1954. The Federal Power Commission in a weak moment gave the Pacific Northwest Pipeline Corp. the right to enter the California market. So El Paso moved to acquire the potential competitor and after Arthur Dean said the merger would be OK went ahead and acquired the stock of Pacific Northwest. Arthur Dean a private citizen representing the oil companies was more powerful than the U.S. As pointed out he succeeded in other instances in squelching antitrust activity.

The El Paso case dragged on for years and years, went to the Supreme Court four times and elicited a remark by Justice Douglas that any one would have to have blinders on not to see the merger was illegal.

Another case filed in 1950 (West Coast Petroleum) by the Justice Dept. attempted to divest Calif. Standard of its service stations. The judge in charge said he would not order divestiture even if Justice proved its allegation. So Justice settled for a consent decree which meant that all the evidence was put in the deep freeze where injured parties and even state and federal governments cannot see it.

A few years later Justice lost another case where a price conspiracy was proved. Although the Alexandria, Va. grand jury returned an indictment, Judge Savage threw the case out of court and thereafter resigned to become Vice President of Humble Oil (a subsidiary of Standard of N. J.).

Colonial Pipeline also received some attention from the perennial loser of antitrust oil cases. This time Justice did not even go through the motions of losing. The Colonial seemed on the face of it to be in violation of the antitrust laws. It is a so-called common carrier which runs from the Gulf Coast refineries through Virginia, Washington and into New Jersey. The major oil companies that own Colonial (Shell, Jersey Standard and Calif. Standard) also own the Plantation pipeline. These two pipelines supply according to Mark Green 79 percent of the gasoline sold in the entire Southeast. Pipelines under existing law are supposed to be open to anyone who needs to transport oil or gas. (Hepburn Act of 1906) But this pipeline was apparently designed to exclude everyone but the owners. So the antitrust division drew up papers that called for divestiture of all but one owner of the Colonial Pipeline. But nothing happened. Every three months it was said attorney would yawn and ask, "Whatever happened to Colonial Pipeline?" (IBID, p. 285)

After the Colonial fiasco the merger movement accelerated. By 1971 eight firms that were among the 25 top oil companies in 1960 had been taken over by other big oil companies. These were: Standard of Kentucky, Pure, Tidewater, Richfield, Sunray DX, Sinclair, Standard of Ohio and Amerada.

The wave of mergers in big oil was accompanied by a wave of oil-coal mergers. Gulf oil acquired Pittsburgh and Midway Coal; Gulf also acquired Consolidated coal (which produced 11 percent of all coal mined in the U.S.), Standard of Ohio acquired Old Ben Coal and Enos Coal; Belco acquired Hawley Fuel Corp.; Occidental Petroleum acquired Maust Properties; Westrans Industries acquired Canterbury Coal, Kristianson and Johnson Coal; Humble Oil acquired Monerey Coal, Eastern Gas and Fuel acquired Joanne Coal, Ranger Fuel and Sterling Smokeless; Gulf Resources Chemical acquired C and K Coal; Falcon Seaboard acquired Breathitt County Coal, Black Eagle Coal, Mt. Top Strip-ping and Pine Bluff Augur; McCulloch Oil acquired Marietta Coal, Kingdom Come coal, Number 7 Corp. Carbon Fuel and Big Four. U.S. Natural Resources acquired Twilight Industries; Zapeta Corp. acquired Boone County Coal; Crestmont Oil and Gas acquired Black Lode Coal; Ethel Corp. acquired Elk Horn; Houston Natural Gas acquired Ziegler Coal and International Mining and Petroleum acquired Belva Coal. (An economic analysis of Price Increases in the Coal Industry, James R. Barth and James T. Bennett, IV, 15-17)

A Subcommittee of the Senate Interior Committee in commenting on the acquisition of Signal Oil by Burmah, one of the largest oil companies in the world said, "without a competitive infra-structure, free market forces cannot be relied upon to curb inflation and unemployment . . . the Justice Department has been able to mount only token opposition to the accelerated merger movement and the concomitant increase in concentration which has taken place in the petroleum industry . . . The last major petroleum industry antitrust case brought by the Justice Department occurred during the 1930's and withered away after more than 20 years without any significant remedial action taking place." (Special Subcommittee on Integrated Oil Operations of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. Senate, Oct. 10, 1974.)

V. MYTHS AND ANTITRUST

The myth of competition in the oil industry has persisted for years. Robert G. Dunlop, President of Sun Oil, told the Senate Antitrust Committee that he opposed voluntary action in restricting oil imports because "that would be destructive of the basic principle of competitive enterprise in this country and thus individual freedom and opportunity." Then he justified the mandatory import program because it gave his company legal protection. Because Dunlop lived in a fantasy world he did not recognize the contradiction.

In order to convince the committee that the free market really existed Dunlop contended that Venezuelan crude oil was offered willy-nilly to independent marketers in the U.S. He ignored the fact that the major consistently refuse to sell oil to independents. "We will sell the oil at whatever the competitive circumstances are in the market place." (Hearings, Judiciary Subcommittee, May 1969. The Petroleum Industry, Part II, p. 786.)

M. A. Wright, Chairman of the Board of Humble Oil, subsidiary of Exxon, said: "Alaska is a highly competitive area today. We were fortunate enough to discover the first oil field but there are a dozen rigs running up there now, four of which we are participating in, but all the information is being held confidential for competitive reasons, and there is a lease sale coming up this summer in which there will be tremendous competition in buying leases, bidding on leases, this sort of thing, and I think if I revealed our leases on what we think the reserves are in Alaska today, this would be working to the detriment of my company . . . let me not expose my own company's views on this highly competitive situation." (IBID, p. 745.)

What is the real competitive situation in Alaska? More than 90 percent of the oil and gas leases are owned by three companies. The production will be controlled by the same consortium that is building the pipeline. As indicated previously, the monopoly situation is so self evident that a high ranking attorney in Justice resigned when he was told by Attorney General Mitchell to drop the case which would lead to a conviction of a violation of the Sherman Act.

Webster defines a myth as a traditional story used to explain some phenomenon. A myth is also defined as a fable, fiction or falsehood, or imaginary person or thing, a mythology which after being believed in for a while becomes irrational or unintelligible.

What could be more irrational and unintelligible than competition in the oil industry? A consortium of four companies control the oil coming out of Saudi Arabia. The same is true of Iran and other countries in the Mideast, Indo-China and Venezuela. As indicated in the first part of this study a few companies control more than 90 percent of the oil reserves in the U.S. They own the productive facilities, the tankers, the pipelines, 85 percent of the refineries, 75 percent of the retail outlets.

Why do they permit the independents to exist when a few telephone calls would end their existence? M. B. Holdgraf of the Independent Gasoline Marketing Council answered this question. "It is my experience and my belief that the major integrated oil companies want just enough independent action to qualify for peace with the Justice Department and with the Federal Trade Commission, so that they can manage, inside of their total integrated system, the volume and/or the pricing structure. They want just enough to be at peace with the world." (Senate Antitrust Subcommittee Hearings, June and July, 1974, p. 152.)

Holdgraf describes the myth that are created by the oil companies in an effort to convince Congress and the public that the industry is competitive. He describes the myth of the major brand independent. It is explained to Congressional Committees that thousands of small independent businesses are spawned and nurtured by them.

The "small independent" businesses are not independent at all and are not a part of the mythical free market. They are creatures and slaves of the major oil companies. Their leases may be cancelled and their supplies cut off at any time. Thousands of them have been put out of business during the alleged shortages of the past few years. 1300 gasoline retailers closed their doors in New England.

Those who showed any sign of independence were marked for extinction. One of these was William J. Webb of Saginaw, Mich. He handled petroleum products under the Boron label which is Standard Oil of Ohio. Webb was an unusual major brand operator. He also handled an independent competitive gasoline operation which he called the Rebel Division. This apparently incurred the disfavor of Boron which cancelled his contract.

Webb told Senator Hart's committee that he had built up the Boron business over a period of years and that now the company was forcing him out of business. Boron, he said, had built eight new stations to accomplish its aim. These stations cost $1,160,000 or $145,000 each and were selling only 22,000 gallons of gas a month. "It would take twice that number of gallons to justify that investment," said Webb. " . . . the result can only be a higher gasoline price with no competitive force in the market place . . . unless relief comes at once we will see 19 small independent business people go down the drain, plus investments representing $2 and ½ million lost, plus much finished products at the gas pump . . . my story is one small man in a small community who fell under the hands of big business." (IBID, p. 115)

The twin myth of the branded station operator as an independent is the myth of the private brand operator as a destructive force who causes price wars. Actually, says Holdgraf, the majors start price wars to put the independents out of business. The independent marketer represents the only competitive force at the retail level.

Then there is the myth of surplus gasoline. The majors only produce and refine as much gasoline as the market will absorb at high prices. Sometimes the majors make a mistake and produce too much. For example, Exxon notified the Texas Railroad Commission that it had 800,000 bbls. of oil more than it needed. This mistake was immediately followed by a reduction in production which sustained the consumer prices. Actually prices had gone down a little. The function of the marketing of the majors is to enable management to dispose of all manufactured products while profit making from the production and sale of crude oil is maximized.

It is easy to see why the independent marketer is hated and labeled an outlaw by the integrated company. If he has access to supply, to refining and to crude oil he becomes a threat to the fine balance in the whole system of production and marketing. This is the reason why in the past integrated producers have subsidized their branded stations by credit cards, prizes, trading stamps and various free services.

Major integrated companies have created the myth that they have been responsible for exploration and development. Over the years independents have been responsible for ¾ of the finding and development of new wells. In 1956, 58,160 wells were drilled for domestic oil and gas in the United States. In the state of Arkansas in 1968 there were 80 new wild cat wells drilled. Ninety percent were drilled by small companies. In 1970 it was anticipated that the industry would drill only 30,246 or 48 percent under the 1956 level. Clinton Engstrand of the Texas Independent Producers contended that ¾ of the decline represented reduced activity by the small companies and independents. Chase Manhattan Bank estimated that 27 major companies produced 4,408,000 bbls. of crude oil daily in 1956 and that the rest of the industry produced 2,745,000 bbls. daily. By 1969 the 27 major companies were producing 6,418,000 bbls. of the industry or an increase of over 2 million bbls. while the rest of the industry increased by only 53,000 bbls.

Walter J. Simas, President of Ashland Oil of Oakland, Calif., managed to outwit the major oil companies in 1967 but finally was defeated when the Dept. of Interior joined the effort to put him out of business. Ashland was a family corporation owned by Simas and his wife Jean. Simas, an old oil man who said he had been in the oil business for 40 years, was an oil marketer. He was a wholesale dealer who sold to 103 stations but he lacked a reliable source of supply. He wanted to get a firm contract with a refiner who could guarantee him 5 million gallons of gasoline a month which was the amount he needed at the time (1966) to supply his customers.

At this time the major oil companies refined 90 percent of the oil sold, and since some independents (called "concubines" by Fred Hartley of Union Oil) were closely tied to the big oil companies the position of an independent not in the club was precarious. At any time his supply might be shut off.

The "real" independents comprised supplied only about 5 percent of the market. The Ashland stations dispensed less than 1 percent. In Calif. the majors would not sell to any stations except their own house brand outlets.

Ashland got hold of a terminal in 1966 by a low bid which would enable him to handle 5 million gallons a month. But he had not reliable source of supply. The majors and the concubine refiners wouldn't sell to him and he was barred from importing because of quotas. However, under the regulations he would be allowed to get access to 10 million gallons of gas for the West Coast if he could find some refiner who would make it available to him. So Simas went to New York and after a while finally got C. D. Mallory of Coastal States to assure him a 5 million gallon supply. Coastal however didn't want to use its own tankers. There was a surplus of tankers at the time but it turned out that none were available to Ashland. Hidden forces were already at work.

Then along came Commonwealth Oil which was looking for a customer. Commonwealth was a Puerto Rican refiner which had expanded its facilities and had a surplus of 12 million gallons. This looked like a godsend to Simas who wanted to expand his operations. The gasoline situation was very tight in California because of the Vietnam War, war contracts and other reasons. So Simas as a typical business man looked on the situation as a great opportunity for a free enterprise. So he worked out a four year contract with Commonwealth for the 12 million gallons and began nosing around looking for terminal space for all this gas.

Terminal owners and lessors were delighted. They were glad to talk to Simas and promised to lease or sell him terminal facilities. Then strange things began to happen. Bray Chemical had a terminal, promised Simas space then the next day backed out of the verbal agreement. Union Oil it appeared blocked the deal. Then Golden Eagle Refining at the last minute withdrew its offer. Simas told Senator Hart's antitrust subcommittee, "the terminal has been empty ever since." Nobody in Southern California would lease or sell Simas any space. He became a laughing stock in California. He was going broke at a time when there was a gas shortage because he had too much gas.

Finally Simas managed to lease some land from the Long Beach Port Authority but only by getting a Chicago man to pretend that an out of town firm wanted it. Simas set about building a terminal. For the moment it looked like Simas had won his battle. He spent over a million dollars on the terminal and went ahead with his plans to supply gas at a reasonable price to the independents. He did not dump gas or sell at bankrupt prices. His prices were comparable to other comparable brands.

Then the axe fell on Simas and all his plans. Secretary of Interior Udall cut off his supply and Commonwealth cancelled its contract. Under the quota regulations the importation of the 10 million gallons daily was legal. Udall in a press release said he was cancelling this shipment and transferring it to the East. He had no legal right to do so. Quotas could be changed only by a Presidential Proclamation. The action of Udall occurred on Dec. 15, 1967. He went down to Puerto Rico and made a speech that said the cancellation was to increase Puerto Rican employment. This was not true. Changing the destination of gasoline refined in Puerto Rico couldn't have the slightest effect on employment. Commonwealth cancelled its contract on Dec. 18. President Johnson didn't sign the new proclamation until Jan. 27, 1968. Another excuse given for doing away with the West Coast allocation was that it was necessary to revert to an earlier period when California did get such an amount of gas. This argument was nonsensical.

The oil companies won again. Competition was destroyed and the consumers paid whatever the majors wanted to charge. (Hearings, Senate Antitrust Subcommittee, July, 1969, pp. 1217-1235.)

VI. CONCLUSIONS

The Dept. of Justice should no longer be depended on to enforce the antitrust laws which are related to petroleum and its by-products. The evidence indicates that Justice has never seriously considered enforcement. The Attorney General and the President of the United States should not be in a position of authority to destroy effective enforcement. The Dept. of Justice is a political football which has operated as an agency to serve the political party in power. Democratic Administrations have been as guilty of the subversion of the antitrust laws related to oil as Republican Administrations.

When Lyndon Johnson became President he called the heads of antitrust agencies together and ordered them to go easy on big business. It was inevitable that employees in the Dept. of Justice were responsive to this order since their employment was dependent on the pleasure of the President. President Nixon acted no differently. He was linked to the oil companies early in his political career. Under his administration and that of Attorney General Mitchell the Dept. of Justice was completely ineffective.

There have been sporadic attempts of law enforcement but these have been few and far between. An example was the conviction of executives in the electric power industry during the last years of the Eisenhower Administration. But Big Oil was untouchable. Complaints have been formulated. Evidence has been compiled by conscientious staff men but oil oligopoly has never had to pay the penalty for antitrust violations. It has never been bothered much by competition.

President Ford has shown no indication that he is aware of the long standing and persistent antitrust violations of antitrust laws by oil companies. His appointments related to oil could not have been better designed to discourage antitrust law enforcement. The most conspicuous example is William Simon, who was rewarded by being made Secretary of the Treasury after his violent attack on the complaint of the FTC against the oil companies. Simon, more prominent than any other individual involved in the energy crisis, has served as a mouthpiece of the oil companies. He is an able public relations representative of Big Oil and is parading under the banner of a government official who pretends to represent the public interest.

The Dept. of Interior which administers the public lands and waters is a flagrant example of the subversion and betrayal of the public interest. Effective antitrust enforcement of antitrust laws relating to oil will be difficult if not impossible as long as the Dept. of Interior as presently constituted administers petroleum resources. As pointed out in this study under both democratic and republican administrations Interior has been the choreboy and servant of Big Oil.

Secretary of Interior Morton, while not so flamboyant and verbose, has dutifully served the oil interests. He bowed to the will of the oil companies in regard to the location of the Alaska pipeline and showed his true colors when he fired the Administrator who announced publicly that he wasn't going to be stooge for the oil companies. No wonder Sawhill was considered an oddball by oil men in the Dept. of Interior and the new energy administration.

No one should be fooled by the statement of Rogers Morton made on TV that an excess profits tax on oil is necessary. The Morton tax will be like the Nixon excess profits tax. That is, a setting aside of some of the exorbitant profits of the oil companies for "new oil" discovery and exploration. Since when, asks Senator Jackson, has it been necessary in a capitalistic system to bribe tycoons to invest in enterprises which are already yielding fantastic profits?

In evaluating those who are indirectly related to the antitrust laws one should not forget Alan Greenspan and Ayn Rand. Greenspan, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisors, co-authored with Ayn the book Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal, which brought up to date stone are thinking. In one article in the book Greenspan argued for abolition of the antitrust laws. In another he opposed legislation to protect the consumer. "Buyers should suffer from their bad judgment," he said.

There is no competition except that which big oil permits. Big Oil wants to keep the people quiet. When the uproar becomes too loud and bothersome, the oil companies draw back a little and wait for a more opportune time to put the remaining independents out of business. They are like the man who disliking the dog's tail didn't get rid of it all at once so he cut it off an inch at a time.

The FTC is pursuing enforcement of the antitrust laws against impossible odds. It has not only the administration to contend with but other agencies and the men in Congress who represent Big Oil. As national defense stops at the waters edge so partisanship stops at the edge of an oil field whether it is in Texas or Saudi Arabia. Democrats and Republicans from oil states know that it would be political suicide to challenge the sovereignty of big oil.

The Ford Administration by sponsoring Nelson Rockefeller and refusing to face reality will get us deeper and deeper in the mire. Nelson's brother David is probably the most powerful man in America. Books have been written about the influence of the Rockefellers and they are understated. Even those good men in Congress who are concerned about the power of the Rockefeller family didn't go too deeply (as far as I know) into the oil connections of Nelson.

It was not revealed for example how he indirectly contributed $900,000 to Robert E. Anderson, Sec. of the Treasury under Eisenhower. A few months after Anderson became secretary a corporation closely held by the Rockefeller family and run by Nelson Rockefeller bought out Anderson's interest and paid him for it while he was in office. Nelson was President of International Basic Economy Corporation when it made a commitment to buy into the Dalada company. Dalada was the concern that bought out Anderson and owed him $900,000. As it turned out the Nelson Rockefeller Co. paid Anderson the money. Dalada it appeared was bankrupt or at least near bankruptcy. It never paid any dividends. The $900,000 I presume was a gift. Some unkind people might have called it a bribe since Anderson was said to be responsible for the import quota law which saved the oil companies from competition. At that time (1957-58) the oil monopoly was breaking down and had to be protected by a law which kept out cheap mid-east oil.

There are no indications that anything will be done to avert the coming catastrophe. Unfortunately the oil companies and their mouthpieces in government are blind as well as greedy. Estimates vary but there are probably only about 41 billion bbls. of proved reserves in the 50 states. Oil well in the U.S. are producing less and less. A few years ago annual U.S. production was around 10 billion barrels. Now it soon will be down to 8.6 billion bbls. according to the Independent Petroleum Assn. of America.

Consumption is around 6 or 7 billion bbls. a year in the U.S. This amounts to between 17 and 18 millions bbls a day. Nearly half of this is imported. Using estimates of proven reserves as a guide it is obvious that all the proved reserves will be gone in a few years. One estimate is that Alaskan oil will be gone in 13 or 14 years. There's plenty of coal but it will be strip-mined at terrible cost to the environment. Despite laws it is impossible to recreate the original conditions and with the servants of big oil in power, with Nelson Rockefeller as the quarterback it can be assumed there will be little or no antitrust enforcement. So the oligopoly will have its way. And the new Congress won't be able to do much about it.

The Wall Street Journal's response to the loud tooting of the Dept. of Justice regarding a rejuvenation of antitrust enforcement which has been in a state of coma for 35 years was that such rhetoric occurs with every new administration and should be taken with a grain of salt. Isn't it strange that Mr. Kauper who took a dim view of State Attorneys' excitement over antitrust violations is now beating the drums for action against the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. Attorney General Saxbe is in a rage about price fixing. He says price fixers should be treated as common criminals and that lack of competition is one of the causes of inflation. But not a word about oil company violations of antitrust laws comes out of the Dept. of Justice. The announced campaign against monopoly is a diversion calculated to take people's minds off the oil cartel crisis. The Bell Telephone complaint even if successfully prosecuted would take 5 or 10 or 20 years. No one knows this better than the Dept. of Justice which has cases which have been going on for 18 years.

From the standpoint of the oil companies it is good tactics to pretend to tackle a big monopoly which we could live with and to ignore the oil cartel which is the cause and result of the crisis. It is also good tactics from the standpoint of the oil companies to call for nationalizing everything. It is possible I suppose that some day Congress would authorize nationalization and the entire restructuring of economic society. But who is so foolish to think that anything of the sort is politically feasible now? Yet liberals are saying that nationalization is the answer. They are chiming in with the oil companies by saying that vertical integration is a good thing and that divestiture would be a great disaster, that the courts would never accept it. (The Nation, Jan. 26, 1974, p. 115)

One reads these statements with a sense of frustration and amazement. To intimate that Congress and the courts would never accept the idea of divestiture or the breaking up of integrated companies into competitive segments and that divestiture is something new or untried makes one wonder where the stary eyed socialists have been for the last 65 years. Divestiture (except for treble damage suits) has been the only successful technique that has been used against powerful oligopolies. Most people who have been even slightly interested in antitrust problems know about the 1911 Divestiture of the old Standard Oil company. Most do not know about the meat packing consent decree divestiture which the Supreme Court ordered after the FTC had entered a complaint. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 11, 1974, p. 18678.) Some people know about the divestiture of the electric power and gas monopoly in the 1930s but few know that scarcely

Divestiture would not involve any disruption of production, refining, transportation or distribution facilities. Separating ownership and control of the different segments of the oil industry would increase efficiency with resultant benefits to independents and consumers. If refining were separated from production no longer would refineries be idle when the majors' tanks were filled with crude oil. No longer would leases of filling stations be cancelled, supplies cut off and new expensive and unnecessary outlets be built. Each segment of the industry would stand on its own feet and oil would flow freely in interstate commerce without artificial restraints. There would be no incentive to operate refineries as bottlenecks. Transportation if divorced from oil production would make oil accessible to independents. Pipeline companies wouldn't care whose oil they transported as long as they made a profit. The law making pipelines common carriers would become meaningful. Every filling station operator would compete with every other filling station in its vicinity and distribution would be efficient which would mean that consumers would benefit from the lowest economically possible price.

In U.S. v. E. I. duPont de Nemours & Co. case (366 U.S. 316,361) the U.S. Supreme Court commented: "Divestiture has been called the most important of antitrust remedies. It is simple, relatively easy to administer and sure. It should always be in the forefront of a court's mind when a violation of Section 7 has been found."

Passage of the Abourezk bill (S. 2165) should be in the forefront of the mind of everyone who is sincere about doing something about the energy crisis. Passage of this legislation should be accompanied by the building of government owned and operated yard stick plants, including refineries with adequate environmental safeguards. Plans for the development of new sources of energy from the wind, from the sun and from organic wastes should be programed and financed on a huge scale and most important a conservation policy such as that outlined by David Freeman in A Time To Choose (Energy Policy Project of the Ford Foundation, Ballinger Publishing Co., Cambridge, Mass., 1974) should be authorized by Congress.

CLOSER COOPERATION WITH EUROPEAN ALLIES IN MILITARY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MCINTYRE. Mr. President, my strong conviction of the importance and necessity for increased and closer cooperation with our European allies in research and development is a matter of record. Last year at my direction a member of the staff of the Committee on Armed Services made an initial trip to Europe to explore the possibility of positive actions which could be taken in cooperative research and development of military equipment.

There is no question concerning the mutual benefits promised by eliminating duplication of research and development which has wasted literally billions of dollars in the past. Continuation of such duplication is even less tolerable in the real world of serious inflation and the chaotic economic trends which encroach upon us daily. Another important objective of the first trip was to pioneer for the Congress in impressing upon the European community, including governmental as well as industrial organizations, that such cooperation would be given the most serious consideration by the Congress in its deliberations on the budget requests of the Department of Defense.

The result of the first trip was highly successful, and the reaction of our European partners was uniformly very favorable and enthusiastic. Moreover, subsequent actions by the Congress on the Army short-range air defense system, known as SHORADS, made it very clear on the record that the three European developed candidates would be given equitable consideration together with U.S. candidates in the source selection process that now is scheduled for completion next month.

The fact that all three of these foreign systems are licensed to major U.S. companies insures that, if selected, one will be built in the United States by our own labor force. This also will serve as a most convincing demonstration of U.S. policy in cooperation with Europe.

The general U.S. industry reaction to the report on this first trip was highly complimentary, and there was similar reaction by our European allies. The Department of Defense also has responded in a positive and favorable manner. This initial success prompted me to arrange for a second visit this year by the same staff member to broaden the scope of his coverage to include other western European countries which he had not previously visited and to follow up on his previous actions in those areas which were more promising. I am pleased to report that his second trip has been as highly productive as his initial visit.

Mr. President, following the same procedure as last year, a copy of his comprehensive report has been submitted to the Secretary of Defense for comment and necessary action on a wide range of specific items and recommendations. A copy of this report now has been cleared by the Department of Defense for security and is available for general publication. I ask unanimous consent that my letter and the report, which has been cleared for security, be printed in the Record upon the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. MCINTYRE. Mr. President, I will continue to report progress made upon this matter as additional information is received from the Department of Defense until all actions involved have been completed. All of this information will be of substantial value to the committee in its deliberations on the fiscal year 1976 military procurement authorization requests on which the committee will commence hearings early next year.

DIRECTOR OF DEFENSE
RESEARCH AND ENGINEERING,
Washington, D.C., December 18, 1974.
Hon. THOMAS J. MCINTYRE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Research and Development, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The report of Mr. Fine has been reviewed by the three Services, ISA, and DD&E for security clearance, and attached you will find our bracketed copy. I would consider it inappropriate that you release the letters attached to your report since many contain proprietary and/or company sensitive information. In formulating our responses, the letters will be utilized for information and background.

Interim responses to the specific paragraphs have been prepared; however, staffing is not complete and I feel that it is to our mutual benefit that our responses be coordinated and factual.

Sincerely,

ROBERT N. PARKER,
(For Malcolm R. Currie).

U.S. SENATE,

Washington, D.C., November 4, 1974.

Hon. JAMES R. SCHLESINGER,
Secretary of Defense, Department of Defense,
The Pentagon, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Mr. Hyman Fine, Professional Staff Member, has submitted a report on his recent trip to Europe relating primarily to cooperative research and development between the U.S. and NATO countries.

The report, a copy of which is attached, is very comprehensive and includes numerous items which should be of direct interest to the Department of Defense. Certain items require action to be taken by your office.

Request that the report and attachments be reviewed and cleared for security so that it may be released by the Armed Services Committee. I would also appreciate your early comments on specific paragraphs as applicable, including statements of actions planned to be taken.

Since the preparation of comments on the individual items may take various periods of time, request that those which are ready by December 15, 1974, be furnished first and the remaining information by February 15, 1975. This will enable members of the committee to consider these matters and ask appropriate questions during the forthcoming hearings on the fiscal year 1976 budget.

Sincerely,

THOMAS J. MCINTYRE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Research and Development.

OCTOBER 31, 1974.

To: Chairman, Committee on Armed Services.

From: Hyman Fine.

Subject: Report on European trip relating to increased international cooperation in research and development and production of military equipment (September 17-October 8, 1974).

1. The primary objective of this trip was to follow up on the results of last year's trip, and to visit other Western European countries and companies in the interest of encouraging increased cooperation in research and development.

2. The foreign government organizations visited included the following:

British Ministry of Defense, Swedish Ministry of Defense, German Ministry of Defense, French Ministry of Defense.

3. The foreign companies visited included the following: Rolls-Royce, England, Hawker-Siddeley, England, Hollandse Signaalapparaten (HSA), Netherlands, SAAB, Sweden, Bofors, Sweden, Barracuda-verken, Sweden, Oerlikon-Contrares, Switzerland, Messerschmidt-Boelkow-Blohm, Germany, VFW-FOKKER, Germany, Krauss-Maffel, Germany, Dornier, Germany, SNECMA, France.

4. My trip also included a visit to the British Admiralty Surface Weapons Establishment in Portsmouth, England, the NATO Advisory Group for Aerospace Research and Development (AGARD), Paris, France, and discussions with our Ambassador to Sweden, with the Deputy Chief of Mission to our Ambassador to France, and with General John W. Vogt, Jr., Commander-in-Chief, U.S. Air Forces, Europe.

5. The following represents a summary of my general reactions, impressions and observations relating to the overall trip.

a. Representatives of all of the countries and companies visited unanimously support increased cooperation with the United States in research and development.

b. With the exception of France, which feels that relationships with the U.S. should be only on a bi-lateral basis, the European community accepts multi-lateral cooperation.

c. The growing pressure of economic problems, aggravated by inflation and high oil prices, is a major factor behind the cooperative attitude of the European nations. Other basic reasons for their interest in cooperation are to eliminate or reduce the unwarranted duplication between the U.S. and themselves and to benefit from our advanced technology. It should be recognized that the U.S. also benefits in selected areas where the European community has the technology lead (e.g. the British Harrier VTOL aircraft).

d. Standardization of equipment, components, munitions, etc. in the interest of simplifying logistics and realizing the economies inherent in this approach, was uniformly supported by the NATO countries as a major objective of cooperation. However, as will be covered later in this report, this is an elusive and extremely difficult goal to attain. Major stumbling blocks are primary dedication to national interests, difficulty in influencing bi-lateral and multi-lateral agreements which are usually tailored to the interests of the participating nations with little, if any, regard to the common interest and military effectiveness of the alliance as a whole.

Senator McIntyre directed me to stress the importance of standardization as the major area of cooperation, and I did this at every opportunity during the trip. This single problem has been recognized by all NATO nations as the most challenging and requires the highest priority of attention by the Western European community and the United States.

e. England, France and Germany expressed satisfaction with the various actions of the Congress in authorizing and appropriating most of the funds requested by the Army this year to select a contractor to develop the short range air defense system (SHORADS). They were generally uniform in acknowledging that the languages of the reports of the various Congressional committees and of the conferees supported open competition and were not prejudicial to the possible selection of one of the three candidate European systems (Crotale, Rapier or Roland) to meet U.S. needs. This experience has contributed markedly to their interest in greater cooperation with the U.S. in military research, development and procurement.

f. There is general acceptance by the Europeans of the use of licensing agreements and shared production of complete systems, subsystems and components as the basis for cooperation with the U.S. in development and production of military hardware.

6. The following paragraphs address the various significant subjects which were discussed during the trip, some of which will require actions or commentary by the Department of Defense.

a. British Ministry of Defense—Sir Neal Wheeler, Air Chief Marshal, Controller of Aircraft.

(1) He was impressed with the significance of full restoration of $3.909 million for the Advanced Harrier and restoration of half of the $6 million reduction in SHORADS, making $18.2 million available. In both cases, this affirmation of continued U.S. willingness to consider foreign developments on a cooperative basis with the potential for manufacture in the U.S. under license was considered highly significant.

(2) He stated that the British government decision to jointly finance Advanced Harrier development had not been made and would follow the October 10, 1974, national election. He was impressed that favorable Congress-sional attitude towards supporting Advanced Harrier development in FY 1976 would be more likely if Britain participated financially.

(3) The British through-deck cruiser is being built and will be equipped with a maritized Harrier. Sir Neal thought that the present Harrier would be used for this purpose, rather than the Advanced Harrier, because it would cost less and be available sooner. However, he acknowledged that if the Advanced Harrier could be developed and maritized to meet this requirement, it would have the following advantages:

(a) Improved chances for U.S. development and use with financial benefit to Britain.

(b) Provide a more capable aircraft.

(c) Enhance Britain's potential for foreign sales to other nations.

(4) I suggested that a maritized Advanced Harrier could be available. If the through-deck cruiser program slipped, the Advanced Harrier could be available. Also, the potentially larger quantity required for combined British and U.S. forces and foreign sales would bring the price of Advanced Harrier down.

(5) He said that while the possibility of the Advanced Harrier being adopted by the RAF existed, he was unable to indicate what the chances were of this happening.

b. British Ministry of Defense—Professor Sir Hermann Bondi, Chief Scientific Advisor.

(1) He was pleased with the actions of the Congress on the Advanced Harrier and SHORADS as positive indications of the possible adoption by the U.S. of weapon systems developed in Europe.

(2) He expressed doubts concerning the practical use for the Surface Effect Ship, as measured against the program cost and other alternative capabilities, such as helicopters, for ASW use. He also mentioned that there were substantial technical problems involved.

(1) Advanced Harrier—He was impressed with Congressional action restoring $3.9 million for Harrier.

He acknowledged my suggestion that British government interest and financial support would be very important to U.S. Congressional support of FY 1976 and future year development costs. He said he would discuss this with the British government.

He agreed that the Advanced Harrier, maritized, would be more desirable for the through-deck cruiser than the AV-8A, but this could be affected by the higher cost as well as the later availability of the Advanced Harrier.

(1) Pegasus 11 for AV-8A and Pegasus 15 for AV-16 Advanced Harrier. I covered the same points as were covered with Hawker-Siddeley and impressed him with the importance of British government financial support to favorable Congressional action. He stated that we would pursue this with the British government.

(2) Remotely Piloted Vehicles (RPVs) and Cruise Missiles. Rolls Royce has expertise in ramjet engines. I suggested that they could explore opportunities in the U.S. for applications on a cooperative basis. They expressed great interest and will follow up. It appears that the British government has little if any interest at this time in such weapon systems for its own forces.

(3) Subsequent proposals were transmitted to me by letter of October 17, 1974. OSD should be requested to comment on the details. Copy is attached.

e. British Aircraft Corporation—Mr. Geoffrey Jefferson, Director.

(1) Seawolf ship-based anti-air and anti-missile system. (Possible competition to Phalanx.) The Royal Navy evaluation was presented to the U.S. Navy in July, 1974, and elicited much interest in the technical aspects of the program, but no interest was expressed in adopting this for U.S. Navy use.

The presentation also was made to a representative of DDR&E, Mr. Jefferson. OSD should be questioned concerning their interest in this program and any future plans.

(2) Skua—Lightweight, helicopter-borne anti-ship missile. U.S. Navy has little interest in this because of Harpoon, which is a larger missile, and is planned for the Lamps helicopter system when a helicopter is selected. BAC questions the need for any helicopter system larger than the Westland Lynx which carries the Skua missile. British and French ASW testing with the Lynx (not equipped with a smaller radar and the Skua missile) have been generally satisfactory. The U.S. Navy should explain why this combination wouldn't substantially meet their needs and save substantial development and procurement costs.

(3) Presentation was made on the Surveillance and Target Information Radar (STIR). It is planned to be installed on a 4,000 ton destroyer.

(4) Remotely Piloted Vehicles and Strategic Cruise Missiles were discussed. BAC was interested in the fact that these programs promise to receive significant support in the U.S. and will look into it.

f. Hollandse Signaalapparaten (HSA)—Netherlands—Mr. E. Ferwerda.

(1) The Netherlands government no longer appropriates funds for contractual research and development. The significance of this action was not discussed other than that it reflects growing economic pressures in that country. OSD may have some comments on this.

(2) MK 92 Fire Control System for NATO Patrol Hydrofoil Missile (PHM) Ship.

(a) A derivation of this system is installed on the Netherlands Flakpanzer anti-aircraft system now in early production.

(b) HSA plans to demonstrate this system to NATO Army and Air Forces in the Netherlands on October 23, 1974 as part of the Flycatcher (portable ground-to-air) fire control system.

(c) HSA plans to invite the U.S. Navy to a separate demonstration during the same time period.

(d) There is a possibility that a delay in the PHM schedule may permit consideration of this system depending upon technical, cost and schedule considerations.

(3) AJAX/Vulcan Phalanx. The AJAX is a dual mode radar fire control and gun system incorporating the same dual mode tracking radar principle as on the Flakpanzer with the addition of twin 30 mm guns.

(a) AJAX is planned to be installed on the Netherlands' new standard frigate (similar to U.S. FF). It also is a candidate for the Canadian frigate in competition with the Vulcan Phalanx.

(b) AJAX has been tested by the Netherlands but still requires research and development to be completed. There is an open question concerning U.S. participation in this program. This is discussed in a letter involving offset payments dated June 21, 1974, from the U.S. MAAG Netherlands to the Netherlands Ministry of Defense. It also is discussed in a letter to the U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defense (Mr. Clements) from the Netherlands Secretary of Defense for Material (Mr. Sternerdink) dated in August. (Copy of the first letter is attached. The second letter is not available to the committee.)

(e) A member of the discussion group submitted five questions which he considered should be addressed in this matter. These questions follow:

(1) Does the U.S. Navy support the requirement for a very short range air defense weapon system (VSR/ADS) as drafted in NATO (PG 9) and to what extent does Phalanx meet these requirements?

(2) General Dynamics has made a Project

Definition Report and Proposal for the Canadian Force (Navy) on a VSR/ADS. Is this based on the NATO requirements, and what is the difference between the features of the system described in that proposal and Phalanx?

(3) It is understood that Phalanx has a capability against anti-ship missiles by causing warhead detonation. What is the Navy opinion on warhead detonation caused by the ammunition to be used in the Phalanx system?

(4) Today missiles can fly very low. It is understood that this may cause severe problems in radar tracking. Can Phalanx cope with this threat?

(5) A VSR/ADS is often referred to as a "last ditch defense system". If this is "last ditch", what is the "next-to-the-last-ditch" system? Why not improve this one, rather than taking a completely new approach?

g. Sweden—Discussions with U.S. Ambassador Robert Strausz-Hupe and the Military Attache indicated the following:

h. Sweden—National Defense Research Institute—Discussion with Director General Nils-Henrik Lundquist reflected the following:

i. Sweden—Defense Materiel Administration—Discussions with Major General Carl Gustav-Stahl, Chief of the Planning Directorate and other government personnel indicated as follows:

j. SAAB—Discussion with Dr. Malkowsky, Director, indicates as follows:

(1) SAAB is the sole manufacturer of the military aircraft in Sweden, as represented by the Viggen.

(2) Viggen is a competitor with the French Mirage F-1, the YF-16 and YF-17 air combat fighters for the four nation European consortium to replace the F-104G. However, articles in the press and periodicals indicate that Viggen is not a serious candidate.

(3) (Omitted.)

k. Bofors Ordnance Division—Mr. Lennart Palsson, Vice President and General Manager, and Mr. Ake Isaksson, Director of Research and Development Department.

(1) and (2) (Omitted.)

(3) 40 mm L/70 anti-aircraft gun system was demonstrated, and the results of previous test firings with proximity fuzes were examined. These were very impressive.

(4) The self propelled 155 mm field howitzer, FH-77 was discussed and operated, but not fired.

(5) The Swedish Main Battle Tank S was demonstrated and operated but not fired. This tank does not have a movable turret but has a number of unique features including high rate of fire, low silhouette, and reverse drive at high speeds.

l. Barracuda-verken—Mr. Bo Abrahamsson, Chairman of the Board.

(1) This company specializes in the development and production of camouflage nets and materials. It is recognized as a leader in this field and has particular expertise in production techniques which U.S. industry has not been able to match.

(2) Mr. Abrahamsson emphasized the interest of the company in cooperating with the United States in transfer of advanced technology under normal licensing agreements with industry, including a turn key program to build and equip a production facility in the U.S. Attached is a letter dated October 3, 1974, from Mr. Erik Gustafsson, President, which indicates that he is following my suggestion to contact U.S. agencies to initiate such an agreement. This should be followed up by the Army Mobility Equipment Research and Development Center (MERDC), Ft. Belvoir, Virginia, which is the responsible agency. The committee should be kept advised to insure that this opportunity is not overlooked.

(3) The company entered into an agreement with Dow Chemical a number of years earlier, when Dow was competing with the Brunswick Corporation for an Army contract. Dow did not succeed, and the agreement was terminated in 1973. A cooperative agreement has been reached with Brunswick.

m. Oerlikon-Contrares, Switzerland—Mr. J. Gimmi, Manager (Oerlikon), and Mr. Bon, President and Mr. W. Hochstrasser, Sales Director (Contrares).

(1) Flakpanzer—All weather anti-aircraft gun system equipped with twin 35 mm guns and self contained surveillance and tracking radar. These are now being produced mounted on the Leopard I Chassis for Germany, Holland and Belgium. The contractor stated that the system could be adapted to the M-60 and M-48 tank chassis with some modification to the tank. The Army should be asked to state what requirement they have for such a system and how this system may or may not be adapted to meet this requirement.

(2) There was a discussion of the relative effectiveness of the Oerlikon 35 mm high rate of fire conventional round with the Bofors 40 mm proximity fuze round. This was not resolved and should be addressed to the Department of Defense as an area of interest to the committee. The Department should explain what has been done to determine the relative effectiveness of these two approaches and whether there is potential merit in developing 35 as well as 30 mm rounds with proximity fuzes.

(3) Sparrow Skyguard all weather Point Defense System. This consists of the Sparrow missile with Skyguard Fire Control Unit. The fire control system was demonstrated against an airplane in flight and appeared to be effective.

(4) Bushmaster—Oerlikon stated that during the development of this system they had provided a quantity of 35 mm ammunition for the TRW/Philco Ford gun. TRW dropped out of the program and the Bushmaster development has been suspended but Philco Ford is using the 35 mm ammunition for other purposes.

(5) Oerlikon-Contrares finance their entire research and development effort with company funds. Their philosophy is to subcontract a substantial part of their work to maintain a comparatively small and stable level of production. This approach, where it can be applied, has merit.

n. German Ministry of Defense—Dr. Seydel, Armaments Department, Brigadier General Brandt, Military Materiel Land Forces, Brigadier General Trienes, Military Materiel Air Forces. This was a preliminary meeting followed later by a meeting with their superior, Mr. Eberhard.

(1) Flakpanzer—This was discussed with Oerlikon-Contrares as previously reported, but the following additional information was obtained.

(a) Orders have been placed for the following quantities:

(Omitted.)

(b) (Omitted.)

(c) Krauss-Maffel will be the prime contractor for production of NATO units other than the United States.

(d) Tests are now being completed at the Army White Sands test facility, but there is not yet a position by the United States regarding this system. Germany is ready to proceed if a favorable U.S. decision is made.

(e) The effectiveness of the gun system would be the same whether mounted on Leopard II, M60 or the M48 chassis. It is primarily a case of the vehicle being able to keep up with the tanks.

(2) Standardization—My reiteration of Senator McIntyre's strong emphasis of this met with enthusiastic support. It was stated that if the U.S. and Germany agree upon a joint program, it has a strong influence on its adoption by other NATO countries.

(3) (Omitted.)

(4) Motorola is working on a proximity fuse for 35 mm ammunition. This should be verified and commented upon in regard to the earlier report on this visit to Oerlikon-Contraves.

(5) SAM-D—German strong support continues for SAM-D as a replacement for Nike-Hercules. I indicated how important this interest could be to future Congressional support of this program. The Germans see merit in the possibility of evolving Improved Hawk into a more capable system by upgrading it with specific elements of SAM-D on an incremental, evolutionary basis. The SAM-D radar and Fire Control System would be early candidates. I explained that this was my own proposal and not that of the committee, the contractor, and the Pentagon.

(7) There was a general feeling that if the NATO Defense Ministers took a more active part in decisionmaking, matters of standardization and of the pursuit of specific programs would be advanced.

o. Messerschmidt-Boelkow Blohm (MBB)—Manching Flight Test Center—Mr. Forster-Steinberg.

(1) MRCA—Joint British/German/Italian development of Multi-Role Combat Aircraft. Key element in this program is the willingness of participating countries to share technology. In production, each part of the airplane will be built by only one company but final assembly will be done in all three countries for their own requirements. Nine prototypes are being built (3 for Germany, 4 Britain and 2 for Italy). First flight was August 14, 1974. 3,000 flight hours are planned prior to initial operational capability date in 1978.

The commitment to this aircraft by the three countries could force them for political reasons and national pride to complete development and produce for inventory regardless of technical problems, delays or cost.

(2) U.S. Army has indicated an interest in the Bo-105 or -115 helicopter (Bo-115 is a tandem Scout version of the 105 which the Germans have not yet adopted) for the Aerial Scout as an alternative to a completely new development.

(3) UTTAS—Mr. Forster-Steinberg referred to the licensing agreement which MBB has with Boeing Vertol on helicopter production, which would include UTTAS.

In my opinion, regardless of the U.S. Army's selection of the Bo-105 (or 115) for Aerial Scout, MBB still will push for European adoption of the Boeing UTTAS.

The VAK 191-B lift plus lift cruise VTOL aircraft was the primary subject of discussion. This experimental program is approaching its end unless the U.S. government or U.S. industry takes a direct interest. The third aircraft is being cannibalized to keep the other two in operating condition. The German government is no longer willing to support this technology program.

The statement was made that lift plus lift cruise is a more efficient system for VTOL application than the Harrier concept. Considering that the Congress has directed that the third technology, the Thrust Augmented Wing, be phased out by the Navy at the end of this year and possibly picked up by NASA, the VAK 191 technology may be worthwhile for the Navy to continue at a modest level. Attached is a letter from VFW-Fokker including a proposal for continuation of the program. A more detailed proposal was sent directly to the U.S. Navy. The Navy should comment on their reaction to this proposal.

(1) History of building flying boats. Discussions are being held with Spain and France on possibility of new developments.

(2) CL-89—This is an operational drone being built by Canadair (Division of General Dynamics) and Dornier and is a joint Canadian/British/German program. Canada and the U.S. Army are negotiating on possible token quantity procurement by the U.S.

(3) CL-289—Reconnaissance Drone; Joint Canadair/Dornier development; recoverable by parachute; (omitted.)

OSD should state what plans, if any, there are for U.S. participation in the CL-89 and CL-289 programs.

(4) Kelbitz—Tethered rotor platform with fuel fed continuously from the ground or ship.

There now is a cooperative program with France which involves a French radar mounted on Kelbitz for battlefield surveillance. This is called Argus. Two prototypes being built. Could also serve as RPV relay station.

The Sea-Kelbitz, for shipbased operation, combines the Dornier Kelbitz with the British Ferrante Seaspray radar which now is being tested.

U.S. Interest-Boeing entered into an agreement to license Kelbitz some two and a half years ago. Boeing is exploring possibility of a sensor test. Kelbitz will be demonstrated to U.S. Army in November or December 1974. Dr. Robert Dilloway, Scientific Advisor to Army Materiel Command, has expressed an interest. The U.S. Navy is aware of this program which has possible use as a ship-based RPV. The Navy should comment on this.

(5) Aerodyne Drone—Sponsored by German military beginning in 1967. Advanced development program.

(6) Alpha-Jet—Cooperative development between France (Dassault) and Germany (Dornier). France will use this as a trainer while Germany will use it as a close air support aircraft. Has two newly developed SNECMA Turbomeca Larzac 04 engines. IOC date is 1977 for German Air Force. Development started in May 1972 with first flight in October 1973. It is interesting that, unlike the U.S. where development is covered by a cost reimbursement type contract, this development was done under a fixed price contract. OSD should comment on this as well as on the fact that only four development prototypes were built and no preproduction prototypes were involved. OSD also should address a possible interest as a U.S. trainer.

(7) Standardization of aircraft guns—The Alpha-Jet for the French contains a DEFA 30 mm gun which is the same caliber being used by the U.S., while the Germans will use a 27 mm Mauser cannon. This is a single barrel gun carried in a pod centerline below the fuselage. The 27 mm gun size also is being used in the MRCA airplane. This illustrates the broad problem of standardization which is unduly complicated by the various NATO countries adopting different guns with different sizes of ammunition for their operating forces. This is a major concern to be addressed by OSD.

r. Krauss-Maffel, Munich—Mr. Hans-Dietrich Von Bernuth. The entire discussion involved the Army XM-1 and the Krauss-Maffel Leopard II (L II) tanks. The meeting was held at the contractor's plant but was conducted by Brigadier General Brandt from the German Ministry of Defense. Significant points of discussion follow:

(c) Growing shortage of funds pushes all NATO countries towards greater cooperation in research and development and procurement.

(d) It is necessary to put national prestige into a secondary role and become partners rather than competitors on an international basis. The German Ministry of Defense and the U.S. Department of Defense have joined in formal support of this philosophy.

(2) Tri-lateral MOU (UK/US/FRG) covering main armament assessment provides for comparative trials during 1975. Participation by France is now under discussion.

(3) U.S. is testing L II chassis at Aberdeen Proving Ground. Trials show that almost all U.S. requirements are being met. U.S. should seriously consider the possibility on a competitive basis, of adopting L II with modifications to meet the XM-1 requirement.

(4) Germany has ordered another L II prototype to be fitted with improved armor to meet U.S. Army requirements. They will pay for this.

(6) (Omitted.)

An MOU is under discussion to cover this approach. Draft MOU was sent to U.S. Department of Defense in August 1974. U.S. Army on October 3, 1974 returned the MOU with many proposed changes. Now being staffed within the German MOD.

Germans consider U.S. Army changes to be very comprehensive and very expensive. For example, the U.S. Army wants tests to be conducted in the U.S. The L II prototype would be brought to the U.S. The Germans are willing to do this at their expense. U.S. wants Germans also to produce test sections for live firing tests in the U.S. Such testing would save costs if conducted in Germany. U.S. also wants a hull and turret to be brought to the U.S. for test. This is a new requirement. (Mr. Wahl of the German MOD was concerned about this and planned to speak with Dr. Currie in Paris several days after my visit.)

General Brandt said that his visit to the U.S. in February 1974 on this problem was not conducive to the objective of exploring this joint test program. He recognized the need to win U.S. Army support. Mr. Wahl wrote directly to General Deane, U.S. Army Chief of Research and Development, about this.

(7) Teledyne-Continental has a licensing agreement with MTU for the Model MB 873 MTU engine for the XM-1. U.S. Army has decided that the first two tanks will have the Continental engine but the third vehicle will have the MB 873 MTU engine. This is the subject of a study being conducted under the XM-1 program.

(8) FMC Corp. and Krauss-Maffel executed a Memorandum of Understanding several months ago whereby FMC would build the modified L II tank if the program is approved. This was informally discussed by General Brandt with General Deane, who thought that Germany should direct the study because if the U.S. Army directed it and the study was negative, the Army could be criticized for not being objective. He also felt that this would overburden the XM-1 Program Office. General Brandt feels that it is important for the U.S. Army to direct the study and the results should be available by June 1976 when comparative trials with the XM-1 are concluded. He said that a German directed study would be useless because the U.S. Army knows the requirements, limitations, and procurement procedures. This study was to be discussed at the next four power meeting.

(9) The L II Daimler Benz engine, combined with the Reink transmission and the Diehl track has a growth potential up to 2,000 horsepower. This compares with a potential of 1,800 for both the General Motors Continental powered XM-1 and Chrysler Avco Lycoming powered XM-1 candidates. OSD should address the practicability of another possible approach involving the two XM-1 contractors building a prototype tank with the L II power train (engine, transmission and track).

The XM-1 versus the modified Leopard II is an issue of major importance to the Germans, to the U.S. Army, and to the Congress. OSD should consider all of the facts in this report and advise the committee of their reaction and of their future plan for this program. The simple objective should be to select the most capable system to meet the stated requirement at the least cost. Schedule considerations should be somewhat flexible to permit the most cost effective choice. The attached letter dated June

s. German Ministry of Defense—Mr. Eberhard. With further reference to paragraph 6n above, I met privately with General Brandt and Mr. Eberhard, his superior. The results of this meeting are as follows:

(1) He confirmed Germany's complete support of cooperation with the U.S. and other NATO countries in research and development and production as well as standardization of weapons and other military equipment. He added that Germany is willing to reduce technical and operational requirements by as much as 15 percent to achieve commonality and interoperability with other NATO forces.

(2) I described the current status of development of the Pershing II missile including final Congressional action on the FY 1975 program which reduced the Pershing II funds requested from $11.2 million to $2 million. The $12 million for the companion radar area correlation program was approved as requested to support supersonic flight test prior to initiation of Pershing II development. The Congress has recognized that Germany, having Pershing I missiles deployed, should be interested in ultimately adopting Pershing II.

I suggested that Germany could be interested in joining the U.S. in developing Pershing II. This would enhance approval and support of Pershing II by the Congress if it proves technically sound. It also could lead to cooperative production with Germany under appropriate licensing agreements. Mr. Eberhard said that he would be willing to discuss this the following week when he met in Paris with DDR&E representatives.

(3) SAM-D—I reviewed the situation as discussed under paragraph 6n(5). Mr. Eberhard agreed to discuss this at the Paris meeting previously described, for possible German participation in an evolving SAM-D program. I added that this could possibly include production of SAM-D components in Germany, under appropriate licensing agreements with U.S. contractors.

(4) Offset funding—We discussed the need to clarify problems involved in German government approval of individual R&D projects in time to be candidates for offset funding support. It appears that Germany must explore this in relation to their internal programming and budgeting cycle which does not coincide with the bi-annual offset funding agreements between U.S. and Germany. Mr. Eberhard said that he would discuss this in Paris with DDR&E the following week and would explore the internal German government impediments to greater use of offset funds for R&D. I said that I would pursue it with OSD. I explained that I had discussed this with Dr. Shields, OSD ISA, and that my efforts were consistent with the views of that office.

(5) Mr. Eberhard expressed his appreciation of my efforts in furthering consideration of the three European candidates for the SHORADS program. He complimented Senator McIntyre, the Armed Services Committee, and both houses of Congress for approving funds for FY 1975 and directing that source selection be based on an objective and competitive basis.

(6) Armbrust—This is a light antitank weapon being developed by MBB in Germany. It was an item of interest addressed as the result of my trip last year. There are some significant technical problems which must be solved before this program is seriously considered either by the German or U.S. Armies. Mr. Eberhard said that Germany has initiated conceptual studies of a system based on Armbrust technology, and that information has been forwarded to OSD. DDR&E should be requested to provide the current status of any interest in this development.

(7) Heavy Lift Helicopter—The Germans have no interest in this development program.

u. NATO Advisory Group for Aerospace Research and Development (AGARD), Paris—Col. Dimon and Major Catiller. The presentation covered a description of the organization, its mission, its size (40 people including 8 military and 8 secretarial) and its operations. It is jointly staffed by the NATO countries, financed with NATO funds, and grouped into 9 permanent technical panels. The mission is to bring together the leading NATO aerospace scientists and engineers to exchange scientific and technical information, advance science and technology to strengthen NATO, and provide information and advice to NATO regarding research and development. It appears to be an effective organization in the accomplishment of its mission.

v. French Ministry of Defense—Mr. Laurens Delpech, Minister Delegate for Armament. Significant points of the meeting include the following:

(1) General Impression—The three hour working lunch provided an excellent opportunity for candid discussion. Mr. Delpech did not invite my two escorts to attend but he did permit Captain Leverone from the MAAO office to accompany me. I was impressed with his candor and with his statement that he has been dedicated to cooperation with the U.S. for the past 35 years. He is interested in pursuing cooperative programs, but, as his predecessor made pointedly clear to me last year, on a bi-lateral basis. He was complimentary about my efforts last year to foster cooperative research and development with the European community and recognized the opportunity of SHORADS for the three competing European systems vs. Chapparel. He is well informed on the Congressional actions on this subject and believes that Congressional intent is to make this selection equitable. He is a strong supporter of the concept of standardization as a principle but recognizes it is somewhat elusive in practice.

(3) Offset Agreements—He suggested that instead of individual agreements on an item-by-item basis the approach should be to negotiate an overall offset agreement with the U.S. to include not only military equipment but also military "related" equipment such as commercial aircraft engines. I told him that his idea appears to have merit although I did not then feel qualified to address its full implications. This is an item for attention by the Departments of Defense, Commerce and State. DOD should be asked to comment on this.

(4) (Omitted.)

(5) SAM-D—Discussed previously with the German MOD, as described under paragraphs 6n(5) and 6s(3). Mr. Delpech said that he is interested in my suggestion of potential French participation in evolutionary improvement of Improved Hawk with SAM-D subsystems as they are developed and proven. (Here again, that is a potential opportunity for either bi-lateral or multi-lateral programs with Germany and/or France.) OSD should comment on this possibility and desirability of a joint program with France and/or Germany.

(6) Advanced Harrier—This was not an item discussed with Mr. Delpech. However, upon my return from the trip, I was invited to a dinner with General Jouffret who works directly with Mr. Delpech, and some French Embassy people. I explained that if the British government does not support the Advanced Harrier, this could jeopardize Congressional support of this program in FY 1976. I suggested that if the British did not support the program the French government may have an interest in filling the gap. The potential for shipboard operation may be of interest to the French Navy and the potential for military sales to other countries could be of interest to the French government. I stated that my personal concern was that the program could go down the drain if the U.S. was left as the sole supporter. While I did not make the point, I believe that in a broader sense, the opportunity to obtain French participation on a tri-nation basis including the U.S. could be a breakthrough in departing from their classic and restrictive bi-lateral policy. (I conveyed this information to Dr. Currie before he left on his trip to attend a CNAD meeting during the last week of October 1974.)

(7) Javelot Air Defense Gun—Last year, U.S./France completed Phase I, demonstrating the feasibility of this concept. Phase II, testing of the gun against aerial targets, is contingent on agreement by U.S. and France to proceed. The French are awaiting the U.S. decision. OSD should state what decision has been made, or when it may be expected.

(8) (Omitted.)

(9) Lynx ASW Helicopter developed by U.K. and France—Although the U.S. Navy now is considering a UTTAS derivative as a candidate to satisfy the Lamps requirement, the Lynx is cheaper and carries a smaller payload. It also will be used by the British. OSD should address the need for the payload and range requirement specified by the U.S. Navy for the Lamps mission and advise the committee if a smaller, less capable helicopter than UTTAS will suffice. (Refer to paragraph 6e(3). This was also discussed after my return with representatives of Westland Helicopters, British participant in Lynx development.)

w. SNECMA, Paris—Mr. J. C. Malroux, Program Director. Highlights of this visit are as follows:

(1) CFM 56 Engine—The cooperative program between General Electric and SNECMA to develop this 10 ton high bypass turbofan engine is a notable example of combining technology and resources with the objective of mutual benefit to the companies as well as to the United States and France. G.E. contributed engine core technology while SNECMA's contribution is development of the low pressure system, reverser system, gear box, accessory integration and engine installation.

SNECMA feels very strongly that their technical contribution to this joint development is of substantial significance.

The CFM 56 engine has significant potential for a wide range of airplane applications, both military and civilian.

The CFM 56 program is progressing satisfactorily. Estimated total development cost of $500 million, of which about $50 million already has been spent. Engine development and certification is scheduled for completion in December 1977.

(2) The SNECMA engine facilities in the Paris area impressed me as being modern in all respects.

(3) SNECMA has a long history of successful engine development and production as represented by the ATAR engine family powering the Mirage III airplane. Current engine developments include the M53 for the next generation of French combat aircraft, and the LARZAC engine which powers the Alpha-Jet and will be suitable for drones and RPVs. (Teledyne CAE has an option to license the LARZAC engine for production in the U.S.)

(4) I was impressed with the presentation made on the relationship between their sales and the personnel employment for the period from 1964 through 1974. While their sales increased during the recent five year period 1969 through 1974 from 1.2 billion francs to 1.8 billion francs, some 50 percent, their employment declined from 15,000 to about 14,000. It would be interesting to compare the trends of our own major engine and airplane manufacturers with that of SNECMA.

7. There is a basic and difficult problem concerning the reluctance of the United States to make its advanced technology available to the other NATO countries and to other countries of Western Europe with whom we have special relations. This reluctance is resented by some of these countries, although on a case-by-case basis we do make exceptions. The G.E. engine core technology is an example.

The U.S. concern is valid where it relates either to the possibility that transferred U.S. technology could show up in modern arms in the hands of third countries and be employed contrary to U.S. national security interests; or to the possibility that foreign industry would be placed in a more competitive position and jeopardize the foreign markets of U.S. industry.

There is another factor which must be considered in this problem. It is the practical recognition that technology is perishable. With time and with investment, European industry can catch up and possibly pass us by where they elect to place their greatest emphasis in selected areas. In these circumstances, it is not in our interest to deny our industries the opportunity to "sell" their technology abroad and profit from such sale while there is a demand. Otherwise, the opportunity may be lost with no advantage to U.S. industry or U.S. government interests. This complex problem requires the highest level attention by the Departments of Defense, State and Commerce, although it is not a new problem and has been generally recognized. What it needs now is a new focus of attention in a period of growing economic pressures throughout the free world and the erosive effect of high inflation on a generally constant level of Defense spending. OSD should comment on this problem and take the lead in solving it.

8. Conclusion—The conclusion stated in the January 21, 1974, report on my previous trip to Europe is even more applicable now, a year later. It reads as follows:

In summary, the major conclusion reached as a result of this trip is that it is in the interest of the United States, as well as our allies, to recognize the urgency and necessity for closer cooperation in research and development and to infuse the existing organizations responsible for this task with a greater awareness of this situation at all levels of organization up to the national leadership. In a world of growing technical competition where our very national survival could be involved, and with the growing pressures of non-defense programs in all countries for increased support, expanded cooperative research and development represents a positive method for retaining our lead in technology where it already exists, and for recovering the lead in those critical technologies where we may be losing ground. This message must be emphasized to a larger segment of the Congress. The basic findings contained in this report should be examined closely by the Members of Congress and the Administration and translated into appropriate positive actions. To ignore this matter is to risk erosion of the U.S. and NATO lead in future weapons and possibly jeopardize the future security of all the countries involved.

REPORT ON CONGRESSIONAL PLACEMENT OFFICE

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, on August 18, 1974, press reports alleged that discriminatory employment practices were being followed in certain congressional offices.

As evidence, these reports referred to, quoted from, and reproduced several job order forms which had been removed from the files of the congressional placement office, forms which contained notations indicating the employing offices would not consider applicants from specified racial, religious, ethnic or other backgrounds.

On August 19, 1974, in my capacity as chairman of the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations, which has jurisdiction over the placement office, I expressed my personal abhorrence of discrimination of any kind, promised a complete investigation of the alleged incidents, and directed the staff of the placement office to refuse to accept or process job orders which included discriminatory qualifications, that is, requirements other than those related to education, experience, necessary skills, availability, salary requirements, geographical location, and stated political preferences.

In the investigation which followed, staff members of the joint committee reviewed all past and pending job order forms on file in the placement office, covering the entire 3-year history of that office and totaling approximately 5,000 in number. Forms which contained notations indicating discriminatory preferences of an exclusionary nature were subjected to further study in an effort to determine the sources, timing, and circumstances responsible for such notations.

In addition, staff members reviewed the operating practices and procedures of the placement office with regard to the receipt and processing of job orders, the assembling of panels of applicants to be referred to employing offices, followup discussions between personnel of the placement office and employing offices, and the format and structure of the forms on which employment information was entered.

Interviews with past and present employees of the placement office and with joint committee staff members responsible for supervision of the office were conducted, together with similar interviews with Members and staffs of the office alleged to have submitted discriminatory job orders. Numerous discussions were also held with staff members of other offices concerning their experience in dealing with the placement office in an attempt to determine from non-involved sources whether any placement office practices may have revealed discriminatory tendencies or invited such expressions from employing offices.

On the basis of the information obtained from these sources, the following findings have been established:

First, a total of 48 job orders were found which contained notations of exclusionary preferences or instructions. These 48 job orders were phoned to the placement office from 25 House, Senate, and committee offices. These 25 offices submitted a total of 132 job orders to the placement office, of which 84 did not contain exclusionary notations of any kind.

Second, in the great majority of cases, the exclusionary preferences were based on race, with the job order forms containing such notations as: "no blacks," "white," "white only," "caucasian." In the remainder of the cases, such preferences were directed against "minorities" generally and, in specific instances, against "Catholics," those with "southern accents," persons born under the "water signs" of the Zodiac, and women who wear "pants suits."

Third, in no case could it be determined that a Member of the House or Senate personally instructed the placement office to discriminate against or to exclude any class or group of persons from the panels of applicants to be referred to the Member's office for consideration. Only one Member of Congress—on two occasions—appears to have personally phoned in job orders concerning which the forms show exclusionary specifications. In each instance, careful examination of the forms and study of supplemental notations in the context of followup conversations with staff members in the Member's office, strongly suggest that the exclusionary specifications originated with one or more of the Member's staff employees. And in a sizable minority of such job orders, the job order forms indicate that the notation of exclusionary specifications was made at some time after the original order was submitted, following supplemental calls between placement office personnel and employing office staff, neither of whom in several instances were parties to the original listing.

Fourth, approximately 160 other job order forms contained notations expressing preferences for applications from one or more minority groups. Such notations included "prefer Jewish," "prefer black," "black," "Spanish," "black or chicano," "black or oriental," "Polish surname," "black or Puerto Rican," "minority only," "Mexican American," and "Puerto Rican."

Fifth, since neither the joint committee nor the placement office has authority to establish standards or qualifications for employment in congressional offices or authority to police discriminatory employment practices in those offices it has been impossible to determine in most cases, with certainty, the person or the circumstance responsible for the exclusionary job specifications.

Sixth, there is no evidence available to the joint committee which suggests that present or former employees of the placement office consciously encouraged staff members of employing offices to specify exclusionary employment qualifications or requirements. But, however indirectly or innocently, the placement office did accept job requirements unrelated to reasonable qualifications for positions in congressional offices, and did attempt to honor those job requirements by referring to the employing offices only those applicants who met the stipulated requirements.

Seventh, a number of factors, however, including prevailing philosophies in the placement office of service to Members, the structure and composition of the job order form, personnel turnover and the resulting shortage of fully trained personnel in the placement office, and the ambiguities, misunderstandings, unwarranted assumptions, and other shortcomings that often plague day-to-day communication between individuals in busy offices can, singly or in combination, help explain the existence and acceptance of some of the discriminatory job orders. To illustrate—

The placement office staff, as is generally the case in other offices in the Congress providing services to Members and their staffs, has intended to adopt the attitude—laudable in most instances—that requests from Members' offices will be met, if possible.

Throughout its brief history, the placement office has been subjected to more than normal rates of personnel turnover, due both to relatively low rates of compensation and the corresponding attraction of the higher paid jobs which employees saw daily coming to the placement office. At certain times, therefore, including the summer of this year, the placement office was staffed with less than adequately trained personnel, thereby increasing the possibility of misunderstandings and unwarranted assumptions.

The format of the job order form and the process of acquiring information needed to complete it may also have contributed either to misunderstandings between the placement office employee and the staff members of the employing office or to casual or careless expressions of preferential characteristics. In addition to spaces for information about required skills, education, experience, salary range, and type of position, the form then in use also included space for entering preferences regarding sex, age range, marital status, and other special—unspecified—requirements. Customarily, a staff member phoning in a job order simply stated that Congressman X's office was looking for a new caseworker, secretary, receptionist, and so forth. In the ensuing conversation, the placement office sought additional details.

There is some evidence, in fact—though not extensive—that placement office employees, at the point of soliciting additional information, from time to time queried the employing office as to whether it would be willing to interview black or other minority applicants. However, what was intended as a form of affirmative action in an equal employment opportunity sense may have stimulated a reverse response from the potential employer's staff—and, possibly an expression of personal rather than official bias.

Eighth, it remains to be stated that, regardless of the multiple possible explanations for discriminatory employment practices in Members' and committee offices, the joint committee and those senior staff members supervising placement office operations share a responsibility for placement office acceptance of discriminatory job orders. Although it was never the policy of the joint committee to condone discrimination of any kind, it was a failure on our part not to have foreseen the problem and to have instructed the staff of the placement office—at the outset of its operations—to refuse to accept discriminatory job orders from any and all sources.

Mr. President, while congressional employment practices are exempt from the requirements of Federal equal employment opportunity and related statutes—and thus from the supervisory and enforcement authority of executive agencies—because of both specific statutory provisions and the separation of powers doctrine, such exemptions were designed to preserve the independence of the legislative branch, not to relieve Members and staff from the moral obligation of adhering to fair employment practices.

As I mentioned at the outset, as soon as the press reported the allegations of discriminatory congressional employment practices, I directed the staff of the placement office—with the explicit concurrence of the distinguished vice chairman of the joint committee, Representative Jack Brooks—to refuse to accept, as of that moment, any job orders, or other instructions, requests, qualifications or requirements which involved discrimination of any kind. As I stated publicly on August 19, 1974, "I have ordered the placement office staff to accept requests limited only to the following necessary skills: experience, education, salary requirements, availability, and geographical location. In addition, an applicant's stated political preference will be honored." Subsequently, in view of the necessarily political character of the institution, the placement office was instructed to accept political preferences as a bona fide job requirement from employing offices.

Moreover, in a jointly signed letter, Congressman Brooks and I informed every Member of the House and Senate, congressional committees and officers of the two bodies of this action. Employees of the placement office were thoroughly briefed on this directive and instructed in the means of implementing it. The office's job order form was redesigned, with those sections of the prior form relating to the preferred sex, age range, marital status and other possibly discriminatory requirements for applicants eliminated. Staff members of the joint committee responsible for supervising placement office operations were directed to monitor carefully the carrying out of the new policy and procedures. The staff of the placement office was strengthened by the addition of more experienced personnel and the upgrading of others.

In addition, the staff of the placement office has been directed to submit to the joint committee more frequent periodic reports on the operations of the office including implementation of the anti-discrimination regulations. The staff has also been directed to consult, at the earliest opportunity, with experts in the field of fair employment practices as part of a continuing program to enhance employees' understanding of and compliance with the requirements and spirit of anti-job discrimination laws and regulations.

As a result of these changes, I can report that in the period since the abuses were revealed, not only has the placement office refused to accept discriminatory job orders, there have been only a very few instances where the staff of that office has been asked by an employing office to accept a job requirement that could be interpreted to be discriminatory. I believe this can be attributed to an understanding and an acceptance—throughout the Congress—of the efforts we have made to eliminate discriminatory practices in congressional hiring, so far as the operations of the placement office are concerned.

While I deeply regret, Mr. President, the circumstances which made this investigation necessary, I am reminded that opportunity often arises from adversity. I am convinced the steps we have taken insure that the discharge of its responsibilities by the placement office, from the time this matter was brought to my attention and henceforth, will be fully in accordance with fair employment principles and practices.

However, assurances that the placement office will not be a party to discriminatory practices in congressional hiring cannot alone eliminate employment discrimination in the legislative branch.

As I mentioned earlier, I found the responses of the employing offices to the changes we have made in the placement office operations most gratifying. I am encouraged, as well, by recent actions undertaken in the other body toward equal employment opportunity.

In adopting House Resolution 988, the Bolling-Hansen resolution, reforming the structure, jurisdiction and procedures of its committees, the House provided that the staff of its standing committees shall be appointed "without regard to race, creed, sex or age."

Subsequently, the caucus of Democrats who will sit in the House in the next Congress, meeting for purposes of organization for that Congress, adopted a resolution offered by Representative Brooks, which extends fair employment principles to cover all employees of the House and provides procedures to deal with allegations of discriminatory employment practices within that body.

The proposal would amend the Rules of the House to add this language to the code of Official Conduct of that body:

A Member, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives shall not discharge or refuse to hire any individual, or otherwise discriminate against any individual with respect to compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The jurisdiction of the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct is defined by this code and the committee, upon the adoption of this amendment to the rules, would become responsible for studying, investigating and making recommendations regarding allegations of discrimination in employment within the general authority granted the committee.

I think the time is long overdue for the Senate to adopt equal employment opportunity as a principle of all its employment practices. Accordingly, I am proposing that the Rules of the Senate be amended to prohibit discrimination in employment in the Senate because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin, with the Senate Select Committee on Standards and Conduct having the jurisdiction and authority to enforce such a prohibition.

I am introducing a resolution to this effect prior to the final adjournment of this Congress, in order to afford my colleagues an opportunity to study the proposal prior to the convening of the 94th Congress, when action would be appropriate.

I acknowledge the limitations of my proposal—and, perhaps, of any proposal in this area—in relation to the complexities of prohibiting discrimination in employment in the Senate. It may not be the perfect solution; it surely is not the only solution.

But it is imperative that the Senate—and the Congress, as an institution—act to insure that there is no discrimination in employment in the Congress by accepting the responsibility for prohibiting discrimination and enforcing that prohibition, a responsibility appropriately denied any other institution of our Federal Government by the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.

It is the acceptance of this responsibility, our understanding of it and our mutual effort to see that it is discharged—and not merely the artfulness of the language by which we state it in a resolution—that will determine whether the spirit of equal employment opportunity will be a hallmark of Senate employment practices.

Of all the institutions in this country, there should be no tolerance of discrimination in employment in the Congress of the United States. It is appropriate as we prepare to begin a new Congress that each one of us reconfirm our commitment to equal employment opportunity and honor that commitment in the hiring practices of this institution, in which we are privileged to serve in the interests and at the pleasure of the people of this Nation. We must ask no more of them than we are willing to give of ourselves.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Resolution prohibiting discrimination in employment in the Senate because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin

Resolved, That (a) no Member, officer, or employee of the Senate shall, with respect to employment by the Senate or any office thereof—

- (1) fail or refuse to hire an individual,
- (2) discharge an individual, or
- (3) otherwise discriminate against an individual with respect to compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of that individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

(b) No Member, officer, or employee of the Senate shall, with respect to employees under his jurisdiction, control, or supervision, limit, segregate, or classify such employees in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities, or otherwise affect his status as an employee, because of that individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Sec. 2. (a) The Select Committee on Standards and Conduct shall have jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of the first section of this resolution. For such purpose, the Select Committee shall—

- (1) prescribe procedures for the correction of violations of such provisions,
- (2) prescribe penalties for such violations, and

(3) issue such rules and regulations as it deems appropriate.

(b) In carrying out its duties and functions under subsection (a), the Select Committee may exempt any position from the provisions of the first section of this resolution relating to discrimination because of sex, if the Select Committee finds that sex is a bona fide occupational qualification for that position.

EMERGENCY ENERGY LEGISLATION

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, it is with deep regret that I must report that the administration is not willing to cooperate in enacting emergency energy legislation in this session.

The Senate committees with responsibility in this area are organized as a team under the leadership of Senator Jackson. We have prepared a clean amendment to provide standby emergency authority to assure that essential energy needs of the Nation are met. Our representatives have engaged in good-faith negotiations with the administration and we have accepted most of their suggestions. The remaining differences on the emergency bill are minor, but negotiations over the weekend and into this week were to no avail.

Mr. President, it is painfully evident that the administration is not really interested in obtaining the standby emergency authority. The minor differences that remain could be quickly resolved if there were any spirit of cooperation.

A basic ground rule for enacting emergency legislation at this late hour is that the bill must be limited to noncontroversial measures which are truly urgent to meet an emergency—such as another embargo—that could take place before the Senate could act next year. Our bill provides such items as standby rationing and energy conservation plans for such an emergency.

In an effort to pass such an emergency bill in this session, Senator JACKSON removed his oil price rollback provision and other controversial items from the bill. Despite these concessions, the administration in the past few days has injected its proposal to decontrol natural gas prices as a part of the energy emergency legislation. Changes in natural gas pricing are important, but are completely separate from the measures needed in an emergency. Secretary Morton conceded before the Senate Commerce Committee on December 4 that nothing the Congress could do on natural gas pricing would have any appreciable supply impact this year, or for that matter, until nearly 1980.

Mr. President, the Senate Commerce Committee is committed to bringing natural gas reform legislation to the Senate floor at the earliest possible date in the new Congress. The committee this session held the most intensive review ever conducted of the Natural Gas Act. We recognize that the current regulatory system is deficient because of lengthy delays and great uncertainty. Producers need an adequate price, but that price must also be fair to consumers. Deregulation does not meet that essential test of fairness, nor does it deal with the many other issues that must be addressed, such as curtailment priorities. I might add that we have made progress in these matters despite the obstinate refusal of the administration and the industry to cooperate in working out a reasonable compromise. But even the administration must realize that nothing could be accomplished by considering this highly controversial matter on the floor of the Senate in the dying days of this session.

The administration insistence on hooking natural gas decontrol onto the emergency bill forces me to conclude that the President does not want the authority contained in the emergency bill to cope with an energy emergency. It would appear that his support for the oil industry's efforts to remove the consumers' protection against higher natural gas prices is stronger than his desire to pass this emergency legislation. We were promised communication, compromise, cooperation, and conciliation. But in energy policy, that particular approach has not yet become administration policy. For the good of the country, I hope in the new year the administration will begin to practice what it preaches in a cooperative relationship with the Congress.

PROPOSED ENERGY CONSERVATION LEGISLATION

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the five energy conservation bills I introduced yesterday be printed in the Record. The five bills, S. 4247 through S. 4251, were inadvertently omitted from the Record for December 18.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase the Federal excise tax on gasoline, to make such tax, as increased, a permanent tax, to provide that revenues derived from the increase in, and extension of, such tax are appropriated to the general fund rather than to the Highway Trust Fund, and to provide a credit for the increased tax paid with respect to not more than 500 gallons of gasoline purchased each year by a taxpayer

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 4081 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to imposition of tax on gasoline sales) is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4081. IMPOSITION OF TAX.

"There is imposed on gasoline sold by the producer or importer thereof, or by any producer of gasoline, a tax of—

- (1) 14 cents a gallon with respect to gasoline sold before January 1, 1976; and
- (2) 24 cents a gallon with respect to gasoline sold after December 31, 1975."

(b) The amendment made by this section applies to sales occurring after December 31, 1974.

Sec. 2. (a) Section 209(c) (1) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1950 is amended by—

- (1) inserting "and" before "4071 (a) (4)" in subparagraph (A),

(2) striking out "and 4081 (tax on gasoline)" in such subparagraph,

(3) redesignating subparagraphs (G) and (H) as (H) and (I), respectively, and

(4) inserting after subparagraph (F) of such section the following new subparagraph:

"(G) 100 percent of the tax received after June 30, 1956, and before January 1, 1975, under section 4081 (tax on gasoline) 28 1/2 percent of such tax received after December 31, 1974 (to the extent attributable to liability for tax incurred after such date and before January 1, 1978); and 16 1/2 percent of such tax received after December 31, 1975;"

(b) Section 209(c) (3) of such Act is amended by—

- (1) striking out "4081 (tax on gasoline)," in subparagraph (A),

(2) striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(3) redesignating subparagraph (D) as (E), and

(4) inserting after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) 8 1/2 percent of the tax under section 4081 (tax on gasoline); and"

(c) Section 209(c) (5) of such Act is amended by striking out "paragraphs (1) (A) and (3) (A)" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "paragraphs (1) (A), (1) (G), (3) (A), and (3) (D)".

Sec. 3. (a) (1) (A) Subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credit allowable) is amended by redesignating section 42 as 43, and by inserting after section 41 the following new section:

"Sec. 42. EXCISE TAX ON GASOLINE.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—There is allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, an amount equal to 10 cents multiplied by the number of gallons of gasoline purchased by the taxpayer during the taxable year.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) AMOUNT.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed $50 ($100 in the case of a joint return under section 6013).

"(2) Application with other credits and deductions.—In determining the number of gallons of gasoline purchased by the taxpayer during the taxable year, any gasoline purchased with respect to which a credit or a deduction is claimed under this chapter for the taxable year shall be disregarded."

(B) The amendments made by this paragraph apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1974, with respect to amounts paid or incurred after such date.

(2) (A) Section 42 of such Code (as added by subsection (a) of this section) is amended—

- (i) by striking out "10 cents" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "20 cents"; and

(ii) by striking out paragraph (1) of subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) AMOUNT.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) or for any taxable year shall not exceed $100 ($200 in the case of a joint return of tax under section 6013)."

(B) The amendments made by this paragraph apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1975, with respect to amounts paid or incurred after such date.

(3) The table of sections for such subpart A is amended by striking out the item relating to section 42 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 42. Excise tax on gasoline.

"Sec. 43. Overpayments of tax."

(b) Section 6401 (b) of such Code (relating to excessive credits) is amended by—

(A) inserting after "lubricating oil" the following: ", 42 (relating to tax credit for excise tax on gasoline)"; and

(B) striking out "sections 31 and 39" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 31, 39, and 42".

(3) Section 6201 (a) (4) of such Code (relating to assessment authority) is amended by—

(A) inserting "OR 42" after "SECTION 39" in the caption of such section;

(B) striking out "oil," and inserting in lieu thereof "oil" or section 42 (relating to excise tax on gasoline);"

(c) (1) Section 6421 of such Code (relating to gasoline used for certain nonhighway purposes or by local transit systems) is amended by striking out "2 cents for each gallon of gasoline so used on which tax was paid at the rate of 4 cents a gallon" where it appears in subsection (a) and in subsection (b) (1) (A), and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "an amount equal to the amount determined by multiplying one-half of the number of gallons of gasoline so used by the rate at which tax was imposed on such gasoline under section 4081 if such rate was greater than 3 cents a gallon".

(2) The amendment made by this subsection applies to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1974, with respect to amounts paid or incurred by the taxpayer after such date.

A bill to repeal deduction for gasoline taxes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That effective after December 31, 1973—

(1) Section 164 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as amended (relating to deduction of taxes not related to a trade or business) is amended by striking out paragraph (5) (relating to taxes on gasoline and other motor fuels);

(2) Section 164 (b) (5) (relating to separately stated taxes) is amended by striking out "or of any tax on the sale of gasoline, diesel fuel, or other motor fuel".

A bill to terminate the Highway Trust Fund

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That effective on and after July 1, 1975—

(1) the Highway Trust Fund is terminated and the amount in such Fund, including any obligations held in such fund, shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury;

(2) any outstanding appropriations from, or obligations of, such Trust Fund shall be made from such general fund;

(3) any authorizations for appropriations to be made from such Trust Fund shall be considered to be authorizations for appropriations from such general fund; and

(4) section 209 of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 is repealed.

A bill to establish an automobile efficiency tax incentive program, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 38 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain other excise taxes) is amended by inserting at the beginning thereof the following new subchapter:

SUBCHAPTER A—AUTOMOBILE FUEL CONSUMPTION TAX

"Sec. 4451. IMPOSITION OF TAX.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—There is imposed on each new automobile sold to a final purchaser a tax in the amount determined under subsection (b). The tax imposed by this subsection shall be paid by the final purchaser.

"(b) AMOUNT OF TAX.—The amount of tax referred to in subsection (a) is determined in accordance with the following table:

If the fuel consumption rate (in miles per gallon) of the new automobile is:	The tax is:
Over 15.....	$ 0
Over 13 but not over 15.....	$140
Over 11 but not over 13.....	$290
Over 9 but not over 11.....	$470
Not over 9.....	$680

"(c) CREDIT AGAINST TAX.—There shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this subsection an amount determined in accordance with the following table:

If the fuel consumption rate (in miles per gallon) of the new automobile is:	The credit is:
Not over 17.....	$ 0
Over 17 but not over 19.....	$ 70
Over 19 but not over 21.....	$140
Over 21 but not over 23.....	$210

"(d) INCREASE IN TAX AND CREDIT.—

"(1) 1977-1978.—Effective January 1, 1977, each fuel consumption rate listed in the tables under subsections (b) and (c) shall be increased by 2 and, as increased, shall be the rate in effect for calendar years 1977 and 1978.

"(2) 1979-1980.—Effective January 1, 1979, each such rate shall be increased by 4 and, as increased, shall be the rate in effect for calendar years 1979 and 1980.

"(3) 1981-1982.—Effective January 1, 1981, each such rate shall be increased by 6 and, as increased, shall be the rate in effect for calendar years 1981 and 1982.

"(4) 1983 and thereafter.—Effective January 1, 1983, each such rate shall be increased by 8 and, as increased, shall be the rate in effect for calendar years after 1982.

"(e) COLLECTION OF TAX AND REFUNDS.—

"(1) COLLECTION.—Every person who receives payment for a new automobile on which a tax is imposed under this section shall collect the amount of the tax from the final purchaser making such payment.

"(2) REFUNDS.—Each person who sells a new automobile to a final purchaser shall report to the Secretary or his delegate the amount of credit, if any, to which such purchaser is entitled under subsection (c).

"(f) DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this section—

"(1) FINAL PURCHASER.—The term 'final purchaser' means the first person who in good faith purchases a new automobile for purposes other than resale.

"(2) FUEL CONSUMPTION RATE.—The term 'fuel consumption rate' means the fuel consumption rate determined on the basis of the Automobile Fuel Consumption Schedule prepared by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

"(3) NEW AUTOMOBILE.—The term 'new automobile' means an internal combustion engine vehicle, other than a truck or bus, which is a highway motor vehicle as defined in section 4482 (a)."

SEC. 2. AUTOMOBILE FUEL CONSUMPTION SCHEDULE

(a) STUDIES.—The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall, from time to time, study the fuel consumption rates of automobiles which are subject to the tax imposed by section 4451 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to automobile fuel consumption tax).

(b) CRITERIA.—The studies conducted under subsection (a) shall include tests—

(1) of each automobile model subject to such tax equipped—

(A) with each available engine size (measured by horsepower);

(B) with standard accessories; and

(C) with standard tires;

(2) which shall be conducted—

(A) under driving conditions representative of average urban and highway driving speeds and circumstances;

(B) with the fuel used being of the quality normally recommended for use in such automobile; and

(C) with such automobile carrying the average weight load recommended for such automobile.

(c) REPORTS.—Based upon the studies conducted under subsection (b), the Administrator shall determine the fuel consumption rate of each automobile with each available engine size, standard accessories, and standard tires. The Administrator shall, not later than January 1, 1976, and by January 1 of each year thereafter, report to the Secretary of the Treasury a schedule of all such rates to be known as the Automobile Fuel Consumption Schedule. The Automobile Fuel Consumption Schedule shall be published in the Federal Register each year.

(d) Until the first Automobile Fuel Consumption Schedule is reported to the Secretary of the Treasury under subsection (c), the fuel consumption rate shall be determined for purposes of section 4451 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 by reference to the harmonic mean between the urban and highway test cycles as reported by the Environmental Protection Agency under the 1975 Federal Test Procedure.

SEC. 3. TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.

(a) ASSESSMENT AUTHORITY.—Section 6201 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to assessment authority) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) ERRONEOUS CREDIT UNDER SECTION 4451.—If on any claim for a refund of excise taxes under chapter 36 there is an overstatement of the credit allowable by section 4451 (relating to automobile fuel consumption tax), the amount so overstated which is allowed as a refund may be assessed by the Secretary or his delegate in the same manner as in the case of a mathematical error."

(b) REFUNDS.—Section 6401 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to amounts treated as overpayments) is amended by—

(1) redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(2) inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) EXCESS CREDIT UNDER SECTION 4451.—If the amount allowable as a credit under section 4451 (relating to automobile fuel consumption tax) exceeds the tax imposed by chapter 36 of subtitle D of chapter 1, the amount of such excess shall be considered an overpayment."

(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of subchapters for chapter 36 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by inserting at the beginning thereof the following new item:

SEC. 4. LABELING.

Section 3 of the Automobile Information Disclosure Act (15 U.S.C. 1232) is amended by inserting "(a)" after "Sec. 3" and by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b) Every label required to be affixed under subsection (a) shall include, in the case of any automobile on which a tax was imposed or a credit allowed by section 4451 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to automobile fuel consumption taxes)—

(1) the fuel consumption rate determined to be applicable for such automobile; and

(2) the tax paid or credit allowed under such section 4451."

A bill to amend title 23 of the United States Code in order to provide for standards for the enforcement of any maximum speed limit on any public highway required pursuant to Federal law

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 1 of title 23 of the United States Code, relating to highways is amended by inserting at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"§ 154. Enforcement of maximum speed limit
 "(a) The Secretary shall promulgate, not later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this section, standards for the State enforcement of any maximum speed limit on any public highway required pursuant to this title or any other Federal law.

"(b) Effective after the promulgation of such standards the Secretary shall not approve any project under section 106 in any State which the Secretary determines, after notice and hearing to the appropriate official of such State, is not in compliance with such standards.

"(c) A determination pursuant to subsection (b) shall be terminated at any time such State proves to the satisfaction of the Secretary that it is in compliance, and will continue to comply, with such standards."

(b) The analysis of such chapter 1 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"§ 154. Enforcement of maximum speed limit."

THE FREE PRESS, WARTS AND ALL

Mr. PROXMIER. Mr. President, the free press of the United States, guaranteed under our Constitution, is a misunderstood creature. Even in this day of widespread education, people in all walks of life, with all degrees of intellect and knowledge, misunderstand what freedom of the press is all about.

Defending the free press—which includes the broadcast media—is not the same as defending that which is printed and broadcast.

That is a simple proposition. But too many are willing to equate defense of the press with the defense of the words and ideas communicated.

This week I received a letter from a man in Georgia who suggested that a law be passed that would require that all newspapers with circulations of 16,000 or more and all television networks each day devote space and time to a regular feature called "The Spectrum." That, he says, would present all kinds of viewpoints so that democracy could be preserved. "Spectrum" would include complete coverage of all the news, the writer suggests, as well as reprints from newspapers, periodicals, letters, books. And it would be edited by committees of editors and subscribers. The writer said:

We need a representative as well as a free news media.

And all of this, my correspondent says, should be required by law.

Of course, such a law obviously would be unconstitutional.

I do not bring up this letter to ridicule the writer. He was sincere. And, from my experience, his point of view is shared, to some degree, by many, many people in this country.

The warts on the press do show. They cannot and should not be ignored. They can be removed. But not by the Government. The first amendment will not allow it.

It would be fine if the press were just as we all wanted it: truthful, objective, complete.

Unfortunately, all of those are abstract measurements. The press is concrete. Each of us has his or her own measurement of truth, objectivity, completeness. It is utterly impossible for the press to be all things to all men.

But that is not to say that the errors and faults of the press should be ignored or accepted.

The economics of the news business is one major obstacle, despite cries of monopoly. This subject is a large one, and I plan to get into it in later speeches.

Another obstacle to perfection is the individuality of editors, reporters, and newscasters. They, despite beliefs to the contrary, are just like the rest of us: no better, no worse.

That individuality does give character to newspapers, magazines, books, pamphlets, and, yes, to radio and TV broadcasts.

That individuality also gives us—as readers and viewers and listeners—a chance to pick and choose that which we like; but more important, a chance to see what others are thinking.

Imagine what would happen if my correspondent got his way and we all, regardless of where in this country we live, would have the same material to see and read each day. And we would know it all had a governmental imprimatur, a stamp of approval.

Human nature would have us demanding to get something else.

One reason—the most important reason—for that would be that we would suspect we could no longer trust what we read and listened to. We would know that it was controlled by the Government.

Soon, there would be a movement calling for freedom of the press.

I hope that would be the inevitable result.

But down through the ages, there have been cases where governments have successfully controlled the press. And it goes on right now—in Peru, Zaire, South Africa, Ethiopia, to mention but a few examples we have read about in recent weeks.

Even in our own country we have governmental control over two of our media. The Federal Communications Commission regulates, for the most part indirectly, the content of radio and television broadcasting.

The FCC's fairness doctrine, the equal time provision in the Communications Act, the FCC's requirements for the broadcast of certain types of programming, the review of programming policies at license renewal time—all of these are controls over a free press.

They are tolerated, for the most part, because many people believe that the rest of the people cannot be trusted to think for themselves.

But if broadcasting is a part of the press—and few, very few will deny that—why is it treated differently under the first amendment?

It is not logical.

Yet, we allow it. We in the Congress, despite invitations from the judicial branch, have not acted to give broadcasters full recognition under the first amendment.

We have stood by while the FCC, good intentioned though the commissioners may be, has acted as if each broadcaster were in the only electronic voice in any market.

The FCC in its rulemaking has ignored the evident fact that other stations exist in the same places; that people living in those individual communities and markets have access to newspapers, magazines, and books. The FCC has ignored that there is a marketplace of ideas.

Yet, the FCC says it must exercise its powers to promote diversity of ideas.

That just does not follow.

The FCC policies tend to promote sameness. The FCC, in its own way, carrying out law, to be sure, is advocating something quite akin to the letter writer who proposes "The Spectrum."

Mr. President, to make clear that I am aware of the warts, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a critique of the press that appears in the current issue of the National Observer.

Warts and all, a free press is necessary to democracy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Observer, Dec. 21, 1974]

THE PRESS' PROBLEMS STEM FROM SEVERAL

ENTRENCHED FAULTS

(By Sisyphus)

The press functions like one continuous unfulfilled New Year's resolution. Its performance during the corrupt Nixon Presidency suggested the press should either claim less or perform better. Otherwise, it will suffer additional distrust, even disrepute on the part of Americans.

Prospects for improvement are discouraging because, if for no other reason, editors are more snarlingly sensitive to criticism than those in any other occupation—except, perhaps, bankers. Yet, its freedom is as bountiful as its sense of responsibility is in short supply. Prepublication censorship was quite properly demolished two centuries ago; postpublication censorship has dissolved as a result of the Sullivan and Pentagon Papers cases involving the good, gray New York Times. However, the press seeks additional protection from Congress in the form of a so-called press-shield law. What Congress giveth, it can taketh away, the press lords should keep in mind, afflicted as they are by delusions of moral grandeur.

We can let those who delight in profound philosophical debates wrestle about where to draw the line between freedom and responsibility, liberty and license. The practical problem, considering the foul mood of Americans toward newspapers, radio, and television, is simply to promptly reform their technical operations and format coverage. The difference in approach is as in reasoning, inductive rather than deductive.

Television and radio performance is dismal. Their "news" programs, from which most Americans obtain their knowledge about current events, mostly consists of a pretty voice reading stories provided for a fee by the two major national news-gathering associations, the Associated Press (AP) and United Press International (UPI). Program directors try to disguise the reading-by-rote. At least Frank Blair of the NBC Today show is honest about it—he openly reads the news dispatches on camera. But here is one excuse for radio and TV—each is primarily designed to entertain, not inform.

MIDDLE-CLASS BULLETIN BOARDS

Newspapers have no such excuse. Editors, amid drinks and smoke of their annual self-congratulatory conventions, insist their job historically has been to "afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted." The reverse is, in fact, the rule.

With few exceptions, newspapers are community bulletin boards for the middle class—or, more precisely, for the orthodoxy of their middle-class readers.

The press peddles crime and catastrophe—padded with good-will editorials, sometimes simply rewrites of editorials originally appearing in the New York Times.

Journalism schools emphasize irrelevant accuracies—how high is the steeple? The schools have all the intellectual content of "a training school for A&P clerks," as A. J. Liebling once wrote about the one he attended, perhaps the most prestigious, the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.

The press, until the ghettos erupted and the traffic jams worsened, ignored among other major stories:

Migration of an estimated three million Americans from farm to city between 1957 and 1964.

Creation of slovenly white suburbs by means of Federally funded housing and interstate-highway programs designed by Congress to favor private interests.

Newspapers are shot through with contradictions. They laud "Brotherhood Week" each year on the editorial pages, while employing no black reporters in the newsrooms. They bleed editorially from time to time for the poor, while accepting deceptive advertising placed by food and furniture stores and running color photos of baked Alaska and other expensive recipes on their "women's pages." Even the best of the newspapers, the Washington Post and the New York Times among others, run weekly financial and real-estate sections that are straight skills for the most base motivations in those economic sectors.

Unfortunately, the fabled critics of the press are dead or retired—Liebling, Seldes, and Hollenbeck. The 1947 Hutchins Commission's report on freedom of the (American) press is a dusty curiosity in libraries. At present, a monthly tabloid-sized publication, [More], seeks to monitor the media, but, instead, tangles itself up in intramuralisms that interest press people but are unfathomable to laymen who wish to know what's wrong.

There have been tons of newsprint spent over what's wrong. Contrary to George Seldes, it's not that advertisers control news columns, although their footprints are not uncommon in newsrooms. It's not so simple as a conspiracy of economic interests. In fact, there's less "cooking" of the news these days.

Nor is it another favorite bete noire of critics—the prevalence of communities in which the only newspaper(s) is owned by one publisher. Responsible publishers in Providence; Louisville; Atlanta; and Eugene, Ore., have demonstrated that pretty good newspapers—fair and comprehensive—can be produced without competition.

NEWS BY CONSENSUS

However, the prevailing pattern may be typified by the one-ownership morning and afternoon newspapers in Worcester, Mass., either of which may be thoroughly read in about seven minutes—even if the lighting's bad.

No, a major problem, perhaps the major problem, is more elusive. It might be termed a consensus approach to the news—after all, the original Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution stated a consensus attitude—that a Negro was three-fifths of a white person for purposes of allocation of seats to states in the House of Representatives. A consensus approach, reflecting one or more major orthodoxies among readers, is reinforced by ill-informed editors, lazy reporters paid low salaries, and standard news-coverage techniques that shape the content of the news itself.

SEVERE SHORTCOMINGS

Readers of the "better papers" and viewers watching only educational TV and/or radio don't comprehend the shoddiness of most newspapers, north, south, east, and west—although the opinion-ridden, columnist-laden New York Post does provide for interested New Yorkers an example of the severe shortcomings of papers elsewhere.

A David Broder may stumble, a Mary McGorray may mislead because of a journalistic "love affair" with a public personality, or a James Reston may go stale. But such drawbacks are minor compared to the faults of most reporting. In fact, relatively few readers are aware these three talents even exist. And this brings us to the press associations, AP and UPI, the so-called "wire services."

The AP boasts that three million words of copy move each day through its vast automatic teletype circuits to more than 1,260 dailies and 3,350 radio and TV stations in the United States. Days go by without either the Washington Post or the New York Times printing an AP (or UPI) story on page one.

But for all but a handful of newspapers the wire services are the only source for news beyond their immediate-circulation "bylines;" they can cite that of Walter Mears, the AP political reporter, not Broder or McGorray or Reston. More people read his dispatches than any other reporter's. Mears is a good reporter. So are other wire-service reporters covering national news such as Walter Leubsdorf and Steve Gerstel. UPI's Frank Eleazar knew more about the House of Representatives than the combined staffs of the Washington Post and the New York Times' Washington bureau.

But as Timothy Crouse points out in his book about the 1972 Presidential campaign reportage, Boys on the Bus, the AP and UPI stories on major matters—politics, civil rights, labor disputes, etc.—are overly cautious: "There is an inverse proportion between the number of persons a reporter reaches and the amount he can say. The larger the audience, the more inoffensive and inconclusive the article must be. Many of the wire men are repositories of information they can never convey."

WIRE SERVICES' COVERAGE

Wire-service dispatches are the staple of American newspapers. A news editor often will prefer a wire-service story over that of his newspaper's own reporter's coverage of the same event if the latter's is not in conformity with the wire-service story.

And wire-service reporters emphasize superficial conflicts. After all, they are weaned on fires and accidents. "If you don't learn how to write an eight-car fatal on Route 128 [Boston], you're gonna be in big trouble," Mears says. The deeper controversies become alighted because they violate the consensus syndrome.

Moreover, the wire services' coverage of Congress, for example, is deficient. A reporter finds himself covering more than one congressional hearing. Consequently he attends one where he finds a witness' press release incorporating his testimony. He scurries off to his other assigned hearing, unable to stay for the more productive questioning of the witness.

It's happened that a wire-service reporter has covered four hearings in one morning. His stories become coverage by press release, plus a snippet of testimony shared by an understanding reporter able to remain throughout hearings.

The AP reports that 25 to 30 percent of its domestic news each day carries Washington datelines. At the same time, the wire-service reporter is drilled to remember that at any minute of his working day there's a client newspaper going to press. Inadequate staffing is, then, aggravated by time pressures.

Another deficiency, seldom analyzed, is the role of the "rewrite" reporter. He or she sits in a newsroom, accepts notes over the telephone from a reporter, and then, without firsthand knowledge, rewrites the notes into a story for publication.

The failings of this technique often overcome the advantage—the technical one of speeding coverage of an event into print. The failing is tremendous as practiced by the weekly news magazines. Tens of thousands of words conveyed from their Washington bureaus to the home office in Manhattan where unknowing editors select those stories to be included in the next issue and turn morasses of words over to rewrite men to be reworked into easy-flowing narratives. The product is notoriously unreliable. The editors in New York have reworked Woodrow Wilson's definition of news as "the atmosphere of events" into a formula: News is what the editor says it is.

Another deficient news-gathering method is that of the news conference. The Presidential is the most widely known.

AN INTERVIEW WITH HOOVER

In December 1929, with the stunning October stock-market crash reverberating throughout the country, President Hoover held a press conference. In response to one question, he reported that Christmas retail purchases were running at a volume comparable to the previous Christmas season's level. There was apparently only one other question from reporters—as to whether the newly elected President of Mexico would sleep at the White House during his forthcoming visit. President Hoover replied that he didn't expect that to happen.

But that occurred 45 years ago, comes the challenge. But in 1974, a recent televised press conference of President Ford's shows a worsening of the format—individual reporters strutting on camera as they asked questions. Disjointed questions about the Nixon pardon. No informed questioning about the dolorous economic condition.

GOD'S IN HEAVEN, A SOURCE SAID

Additional practices compound inadequate news coverage—reporters who collect news sources as lawyers collect clients; reporters huddling after joint interviews to make certain they all agree on the "lead" of the story each will write (comparable to price fixing among corporations); and editors who lurch from issue to issue for prime coverage, a sort of interest-spasm-of-the-day approach.

There are other flawed practices, one of which is the ground rules reporters, individually or collectively, accept as a basis for interviewing a political personage in Washington:

1. God's in his Heaven, Rev. Billy Graham said today (on the record).
2. God's in his Heaven, an authoritative source said today (not for attribution).
3. God's in his Heaven, it can be reliably reported (an extreme form of the back-grounder without attribution).
4. Off-the-record rule under which the Rev. Billy Graham tells reporters that God's in his Heaven, but reporters can't print it in any form or shape.

Occasionally reporters refuse to be bound by such rules originally designed to oblige the reporter without embarrassing his source. Occasionally there is mentioned a need to re-evaluate the whole constellation of news coverage in Washington, whether by wire services, the Post, the Times, or the Washington bureaus of daily newspapers.

Competent news coverage is in a class with Samuel Johnson's observation when told about there being a woman minister in the neighborhood: The wonder, he said, like that of a dog walking on hind legs, is not that it's done well, but that it's done at all.

The press is misleading itself in the wake of Watergate. The persistence of two Washington Post reporters, Woodward and Bernstein, is not to be undervalued; nor is it to be overlooked that both were inexperienced reporters who uncovered pieces of the scandal, while for months after month big-shot newspapermen in Washington scoffed or ignored them. But primarily it was the persistence of congressional committees and Federal judges and juries that exposed the corruption of the Nixon Presidency.

WATERGATE REACTIONS

The downfall of Nixon isn't being greeted joyously everywhere. Alan Otten of The Wall Street Journal recently wrote: "While the press is on a jag of self-satisfaction and self-congratulations, there is an unhappily large number of Americans who aren't overjoyed by the Watergate exposures—in fact, they're annoyed, angry and hostile." They are joined on the left by those who recall the press' glamorization of Presidents, the press' self-censorship of our bombing of Cambodia, and more-than-faint indications that working reporters voluntarily, and sometimes for pay, help the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

Blacks share the distrustful mood. The Washington Post, in a recent series, noted that during the first 19 weeks of this year, nearly 1,500 news items were broadcast on the CBS Evening News, but of these only 20 focused on black problems. And, of the 20, 9 dealt with the so-called "Zebra killings" in San Francisco and 2 about Hank Aaron's home-run achievements.

NEWS MEDIA ARE IN TROUBLE

Customarily, Presidents and their assistants and the reporters assigned to the White House are locked in fond, not deadly, embrace. The role is mistakenly symbiotic, not adversary as it should be. Washington correspondents, assuming even the best intentions by officers of Government, should remember an observation of a British government official to reporters: "You think we lie to you. But we don't lie, really we don't."

However, when you discover that, you make even a greater error. You think we tell you the truth."

The news media are in trouble, only a few of their practitioners understand this.

"A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it," James Madison remarked, "is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy or perhaps both."

We shall see if press people turn away from divvying up with politicians free news and free publicity in time to reform formats of coverage before public opinion unfairly shackles them with restraints believed permanently long ago cast off.

BATTELLE MEMORIAL INSTITUTE—ANNIVERSARIES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of my distinguished colleagues two anniversaries that have significance for both the Nation as a whole and a particular meaning for the Pacific Northwest. These are the 10th anniversary of the establishment of Battelle Memorial Institute's Pacific Northwest Division at Richland, Wash., which will be on January 4, 1975, and the 50th anniversary of the establishment of its parent organization—Battelle Memorial Institute, on March 27, 1975.

In the life of our Nation, 50 years is not a great length of time, and 10 years, in the view of historians, is "only yesterday"; nonetheless, these are important milestones to mark Battelle's many contributions to scientific progress, education, the advancement of technology, and economic development. Battelle is a unique and dynamic organization, and what makes it most noteworthy is what it has been able to do and the beneficial influence it has had in our country in a relatively short period of time.

A charitable trust that had a modest beginning, the Battelle organization—now, a not-for-profit Ohio corporation—has grown from an original staff of some 30 people in a single location to a multinational organization with some 5,900 scientists, engineers, and supporting specialists. Charged with the ideals of its founder to use technology to benefit people, and possessing the flexibility of a unique corporate entity, Battelle has been able to become effectively involved in a wide range of research, educational, and invention and technology development activities. It has demonstrated an uncommon sense of initiative and has been a pioneer in development of the concept of sponsored research, and it has been a model for a number of other independent research institutes established since World War II.

Today, the Battelle staff conducts as many as 3,000 different studies each year on a not-for-profit basis for industrial companies, associations, and Government agencies. This research has resulted in new and improved materials and manufacturing processes and in advances in housing, transportation, and education. It is on the forefront in research concerned with environmental quality, new sources of energy, and human health.

Throughout its history Battelle has been remarkably innovative in creating new technology and adapting technology for the benefit of people. This innovative capability is especially valuable in a time of revolutionary changes in knowledge and society. Battelle's ability to act promptly and creatively and to override the lethargy inherent in many organizations is part of what makes it so unique and deserving of encouragement. Battelle's impact in the Pacific Northwest is illustrative of its innovative approach. Its Pacific Northwest Division in Richland serves as a classic example of how a highly specialized Government installation can be transformed into a diversified research resource that serves all sectors of government and industry—and one that "pays its own way." Lawmakers everywhere should take note and heart that there are instances where private organizations, such as Battelle, have pitched in to assist Government in difficult situations, and that it is not always Government being called upon to help and subsidize companies and organizations in distress.

Battelle willingly assumed the operating control of the Atomic Energy Commission's Hanford Laboratory at a crucial time when the AEC recognized the need for shifting the facility's use from specialized nuclear research to diverse research and educational purposes. Battelle assumed this difficult assignment, taking control of the facility and creating its Pacific Northwest Division.

Thus, the 10th anniversary of Battelle-Northwest has a very special meaning for its 1,800 employees, but it is significant to all people throughout the Pacific Northwest region. Battelle's move to Richland 10 years ago inspired confidence at a time when it was much needed, and its presence has contributed much to the economic health and outlook of the entire Northwest.

The Nation is fortunate to have Battelle Memorial Institute with its unique capabilities, resources, and innovative spirit. It could use many more organizations of this kind—organizations with the diverse talents and adaptability to deal with the ever-changing problems and to do so with total dedication to human betterment.

OLDER WORKERS HARD-HIT BY JOB SLUMP—EMERGENCY ACTION NEEDED

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, last month the unemployment rate reached 6.5 percent, the highest level in 13 years.

Nearly 6 million individuals are unemployed, or more than the entire workforce of two-thirds of the nations in the world.

But these figures really only represent the tip of the iceberg because there is a substantial amount of "hidden unemployment," particularly for middle-aged and older workers. These individuals, who may have dropped out of the labor force after prolonged and fruitless searches for a job, are not included within the official unemployment figures.

As the chairman of the Subcommittee on Employment and Retirement Incomes of the Senate Committee on Aging, I have been concerned with the harsh impact of unemployment on older workers.

Latest figures reveal that 1.1 million persons 45 and above are unemployed—nearly a 37-percent jump during the past 6 months.

Once unemployed, the middle-aged and older workers run a great risk of being without a job for a long period of time.

In fact, 264,000 persons in this age category have been unemployed for 15 weeks or longer. This accounts for about 28 percent of the long-term joblessness in the United States.

The situation for very long-term joblessness—27 weeks or longer—is even more grim. Nearly 140,000 individuals 45 and above have been unemployed for more than 6 months, or about 37 percent of the very long-term joblessness in the United States.

With further massive layoffs expected in the months ahead, the unemployment level for mature workers is likely to intensify.

Quite clearly, emergency action is needed now. This is why I voted for the Special Employment Assistance Act, which can provide approximately 530,000 useful public service jobs in all areas of the country.

I am hopeful that this measure can soon be enacted into law. In my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Employment and Retirement Incomes, I plan to follow this legislation closely to assure that the special needs of middle-aged and older workers are appropriately considered.

A recent article in the National Observer provides an excellent description of the problems encountered by persons seeking employment. It also provides further compelling reasons for prompt action on emergency employment legislation.

Mr. President, I commend this article—entitled "Job Hunting Is a Job Too"—to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

JOB HUNTING IS A JOB TOO

(By John Peterson)

Read the headlines and you know an awful lot of people are out of work and that an awful lot more soon will be. One middle-aged man, unemployed for seven months, describes its impact: "My wife used to say that being married to an unemployed bum is fine if you like being married to a eunuch. She didn't, so she's living with the plumber."

The results of unemployment can be tragic. Here, several unemployed people have short-circuited their miseries by jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge. "Unemployment is a psychological illness with symptoms as clearly defined as a disease such as measles," says vocational psychologist Toni St. James. "The most tragic part is that too many of them face its trauma alone, feeling rejected by even those who love them."

Counselors say a person has two pressing needs when he loses his job. The first is to find another job. The second is to somehow arrange his finances for what might become a prolonged battle to avoid financial ruin. Most unemployed people find there are no easy solutions to either need. But there are techniques that might save the unemployed person's home, his marriage, and eventually produce an even better job.

Nearly all advisers recommend reworking the family budget the same day the ax falls—right after you return from filing for unemployment-insurance benefits. "The first symptom of the unemployment malaise," says Ms. St. James, "is when the person says, 'I'm going to take a couple of weeks off and then worry about it.'"

Looking for a job when under pressure is extremely difficult. The search gets more difficult as unemployment grows—and in November it hit its highest level in 13 years. The Labor Department said last week that November unemployment reached 6.5 percent nationally, up from 6 percent in October and 5.8 percent in September. The number of jobless people increased by 500,000 from October to November, the report said, bringing total unemployment to 6 million.

Unemployment often brings the specter of months of unsuccessful job hunting and the loss of your home, car, spouse, mental stability, and self-esteem. But there are ways to order your finances, to hang on to your possessions, to buy "breathing space," and even to find a fresh attitude and approach that can go far in getting you the job you want.

Most financial advisers fall into two camps: those who consider any debt a sacred obligation, and those who consider debts that threaten home, family, and peace of mind something to be discarded immediately. And most unemployment advisers fall into two camps: those recommending the shotgun attack that sends hundreds of letters, resumes, and interview applications to any conceivable employer, and those contending a person must only decide what he wants to do, where, and then devote himself to the research and preparation necessary to land the job.

But there is wide agreement among employment professionals that the unemployed face long months of searching. Statistics show that one out of every five middle-aged men who lose their job will still be unemployed a year later. Figures also reveal that three out of four who remain unemployed for at least nine months will face divorce proceedings.

"The second symptom," says Ms. St. James, who teaches the unemployed a creative job-search procedure for the state of California, "is a real reluctance to get to the next interview, to make the next contact, to accept the proposition that job hunting is tough work. Miraculous job offers seldom materialize."

By this time, says Doug Hayward, a state-employment public-relations official who fought unemployment for months himself, "the job hunter should be revisiting both public and private employment agencies so damned often that the people there are sick of his face. Otherwise there's little chance your name would even be pulled for an opening."

He adds that the jobless period is a great time for the unemployed to closely check any disability insurance they might have had. "Many times, and it is getting easier, this period is the time for the hernia operation or some other elective surgery."

Most professionals agree, too, that private employment agencies fill only about 5 percent of the jobs, state agencies about 10 percent, and that the rest constitute the "hidden" market that must be searched out. In places such as California, where more than 25 percent of the work force changes jobs each year, Ms. St. James says, "an individual must become a successful entrepreneur in the game of musical jobs."

RULES OF THE SEARCH

The third, and possibly most debilitating symptom, is the loss of self-esteem, Ms. St. James says. "After all, you've been unsuccessful in selling yourself. The depression can take over a person, and what becomes ripped apart in him through the introspective soul-searching may never be repaired, because there will always be that worry that he'll be unemployed again."

These symptoms hardly apply to all job seekers. In California, where the unemployment rate is 8.2 per cent, about 40 per cent of the jobless were laid off or fired, 10 per cent quit, 30 per cent are new employees such as students or women returning to work, 15 per cent are second members of a household, and 5 per cent are the elderly. "You don't find the skilled bluecollar worker affected drastically by layoffs," says Hayward. "The nature of their work dictates slumps and then peak periods with overtime."

"If a person is going to pursue the number game—the blanket mailings of resumes, the badgering of employment agencies, and the classified-ad follow-ups—then he must know that there are two basic rules," says the Rev. Richard N. Bolles, an Episcopalian priest. "He must not insert a piece of paper between his face-to-face encounters, and he must pursue as many avenues as possible."

But Bolles—with the assistance of John Crystal, a career counselor in McLean, Va. [The Observer, June 1, 1974]—has devised a revolutionary job-search procedure that enables the job seeker to turn the tables and screen out the employers who do not interest him. The two collaborated on the book, Where Do I Go From Here With My Life?, and Bolles wrote the best-selling What Color Is Your Parachute?, a practical manual for job hunters and career changers.

Already many agencies are adapting Bolles' thesis to week-end seminars and for high-priced counseling services. The process can take months, but Bolles contends it is essential and that professional help is no better than that of a good friend or spouse. "The effort is worth it because the job may account for as many as 10,000 hours of the person's life and as much as $250,000 in earnings. Once you work the exercises, you will have a job-hunting skill," he says. "People forget they'll be job hunting again. If they're under 35, it's about every year and one-half, and if they're over 35, it averages about every three years."

What Color Is Your Parachute? details exercises that help a person determine his skills and his rewards. Generally, it says: The job hunter should ask himself, When did I enjoy myself most—at work, school, play—and what skills was I using each of those times?

"How to get the job is, surprisingly, the easiest part," contends Bolles, who's also director of the ecumenically sponsored United Ministries in Higher Education employment project. "But it takes effort and research. The key is to convince the employer you choose that your abilities, understanding, and insight are essential to his operation."

THE FINAL INTERVIEW

Bolles cites a writer who decided to get a job with Sunset magazine, a California-based magazine devoted to Western living. The writer not only studied the magazine's writing, style, and content, but he catalogued every article that Sunset had carried in the past 8 to 10 years. In the final interview, he showed the editor his findings, adding, "Here's a category in which you need more articles." The category was the writer's area of interest and he showed the editor a list of prospective article ideas. He got the job.

Ms. St. James teaches an "open-end" course where the student only graduates when he is employed. "The sad truth is that only 3 per cent of our workers are doing a job they truly like, and another 12 to 15 per cent get some viable satisfaction. If you know what you want, you can get there," she says.

"Finding a job is a learned skill," she adds. "People are not hired because they are the best qualified but because the employer likes how you look, feel, what your attitudes are. You would not be talking to him if you weren't qualified for the job. Success is five words: Give them what they want."

Ms. St. James, along with job-seeking organizations such as 40 Plus, an independent group of professionals who are more than 40 years old, spends hours teaching job seekers how to behave in job interviews. She stresses the need for a calm, confident voice, and the effects of active listening, body kinetics, and eye contact. "If a person first asks the right questions and then asks for the job they often get it."

Job hunting takes time and money, and some authorities suggest that employees prepare for adversity in advance. One recommended cushion is a savings account equal to six months' income.

TWO VIEWS ON DEBT

But most people start counting their pennies only after they've lost their job. The number of persons coming to the consumer-credit counseling office here has increased 80 per cent in the past three months. The organization, which is financed by the credit-banking industry, says creditors will attempt to make equitable arrangements with the debtor 90 per cent of the time. Executive manager Al Cahen says, "We're seeing some interest-only arrangements" in which the creditor agrees to defer the payments due on the principal of a debt.

Some financial counselors, however, say an unemployed person shouldn't worry too much about his consumer debts. "Under no circumstances should a person lose his home, furniture, clothing, car—any of the necessities—because of debt," says John Slavicek, director of the American Bankruptcy Council here.

Essential steps that many counselors recommend include investigating the possibility of getting food stamps, selling a second car, or working in the evening after unemployment insurance runs out. Too, 90 percent of the states have a homestead act, which means a homeowner's equity in his home cannot be attached by a lien.

THE BANKRUPTCY "OUT"

"The person looking for a job does not need the psychological and social problems that stem from his inability to pay bills and he does not need all of the legal and extralegal harassment that accompanies late charges and threatening letters," contends Slavicek. "The Federal bankruptcy law is a progressive law, a reaction to debtors' prison."

U.S. bankruptcy Judge Lynn Gillard here says: "Frankly, there could be more bankruptcy filing these days. It's an absolute right, you know. But there is no way for me to assess the impact of a person's having declared bankruptcy. A person could lose his job, his credit, but I think that's rare."

Slavicek says it's time to consider bankruptcy proceedings when you start spending exempt funds (in California $2,500 can be maintained in an exempt savings account), start paying late charges on debts, receive one threatening telephone call or letter from a creditor, when your income is cut off.

"People feel they must stand behind any purchase or agreement, for some ridiculous reason. They'll go into a finance company, listen to the terms, and sign contracts that carry from 36 to 45 per cent interest," he adds. "Bankruptcy is not for everyone, but Chapter 13 of the law allows for debt consolidation. The result is that the bill is usually cut by more than half because it carries only a 10 per cent interest charge stretched over three years. What's more, all late charges, harassment, and phone calls stop right then."

Slavicek concludes: "The civil-rights acts protect the person who has declared bankruptcy from discrimination. Too, many companies feel that people who have just declared bankruptcy are good credit risks because they won't be able to file for another six years."

Most employment officials say it takes six to nine months for a person to find a job when the market is tight. "The sooner a person learns there is no job in maintaining his pride, the sooner he'll be getting after a job as best he can," says Hayward. "The standing in line, the constant rejection, it destroys you. I think a person must take every conceivable avenue, every idea, friends, relatives, and use them all."

A BETTER WAY

Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. President, a recent meeting of senior statesmen from many countries and cultures concluded that "a new spirit of active solidarity and cooperation" among all peoples and nations is indispensable for mankind to face the challenge of our time. This, too, is my conclusion—after 30 years in the U.S. Senate, 15 years as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and a fair opportunity to move around at home and abroad listening to people engaged in trying to hold the world together.

I most definitely believe that my association with endeavors to promote mutual understanding internationally is the most significant and important activity I have been privileged to engage in during my years with the Senate. I am convinced that more and improved programs for exchange of persons and intellectual interchange around the world offer the best prospect that we may be fortunate enough to find the understanding and rationality necessary to avoid annihilating ourselves in a burst of nuclear misery. I am persuaded of the inadequacy and peril of the traditional competitive, beggar, and even destroy-thy-neighbor, methods and beliefs which remain too deeply embedded in our own country and elsewhere. In my opinion the hydrogen bomb puts us on notice to find a new and better way to deal with human relations in the international field.

The question, of course, is if we can or will, as Secretary Kissinger has said, "muster the vision and resolution which the conduct of foreign policy requires." I believe we can; I am less sanguine that we will. For we have yet to accept and act upon the reality of interdependence for what it is: the challenge and opportunity of our time. One exception, a most significant exception, is the sustained effort of the United States to promote mutual understanding internationally. This objective motivated legislation introduced almost 30 years ago for a Government-supported exchange of persons. Operating largely under this legislation, the Department of State's exchange programs have produced some 150,000 alumni, including over 20 who are now chiefs of state, currently more than 250 cabinet ministers and tens of thousands of legislators, educators, journalists, and other key individuals in America and abroad.

I think of these alumni scattered throughout the world, acting as knowledgeable interpreters of their own and other societies; as persons equipped and willing to deal with conflict or conflict-producing situations on the basis of an informed determination to solve them peacefully; and as opinion leaders communicating their appreciation of the societies which they visited to others in their own society. In my view such exchange of person programs are among the most significant activity now going on in the world, and I am pleased that other countries are beginning to establish similar programs suited to their conditions. That is a very hopeful development. If and as these efforts succeed in establishing an international base of mutually comprehending leadership groups capable of facilitating international cooperation, then we can hope to supplant the traditional methods of solving differences of opinion according to the standards of feuding and dueling. Therein lies my principal long-term hope for the human race. But there is not much time left, and we and others still are not doing nearly enough, not giving this hopeful endeavor nearly the attention it deserves.

We simply can no longer afford to consider this basic human dimension as a low priority add-on to the serious content of our international relations. The Department of State's well administered programs in this field are currently grossly underfunded at levels approximately only equivalent to that of 1967. Whereas we readily spend billions for the military and hundreds of millions for propaganda abroad, it is incredibly difficult to get the administration and the Congress to invest the few-score millions necessary to sustain this most important activity to the future of this country and to the peace of the world. When one reflects on the accomplishments, it is indeed disturbing that lack of funding remains such an impediment to the future potential of these programs.

Fortunately, we have a Secretary of State who fully understands and also feels strongly about the importance of personal and institutional intellectual relations among nations. As he said to the Board of Foreign Scholarships on December 16, we must deal with what Walter Lippmann called the "pictures in people's heads"—the manmade environment in which ideas become realities. The Secretary referred to our "age when the technologies of communication are improving faster than man's ability to assimilate their consequences, and when the multiplication of differing perspectives and predispositions complicate the achievement of global consensus." He recognized "that the dramatically accelerating pace of interaction among peoples and institutions would not necessarily lead to increased understanding or cooperation." He noted "that interaction, unguided by intelligent and humane direction and concern, had the potential to bring increased tension and hostility rather than less." Speaking of the exchange-of-persons program with which I am honored to have been associated, he observed that "It has grown to meet new realities," "promoted the solidarity of the West (and) now sustains exchanges between the United States and 122 countries around the globe. If expressed, it helps us to master the growing interdependence of the world."

More than any Secretary since I have been here, the present holder of that office appreciates that this type of activity is a real alternative to the traditional methods and that it is imperative to support these new ways of dealing with international human relations. I am, of course, pleased that people in the State Department, the Board of Foreign Scholarships, and the Binational Commissions have made the exchange program so successful. Their dedication and efficiency have been so obvious throughout, that while people occasionally have questioned the program, never has anyone, including the late Senator McCarthy in the 1950's, succeeded in discovering anything discreditable in it.

The question remains whether we can sufficiently civilize and humanize international relations, not merely by improving our traditional way of doing things but by devising new techniques and inculcating new attitudes within our capacity and adequate to our needs. What we can do through the power of creative human interaction in scholarly and other fields, is to expand the boundaries of human wisdom, sympathy and perception. The process is slowmoving but powerful; it may not be enough, but it is the best available, and its proper place is at the center of our international relations concerns. Perhaps the greatest power of such intellectual exchange is to convert nations into peoples and to translate ideologies into human aspirations. I do not think such exchange is certain to produce affection between peoples, nor indeed is that one of its essential purposes; it is enough if it contributes to the feeling of a common humanity, to an emotional awareness that other countries are populated not by doctrines that we fear but by individuals—people with the same capacity for pleasure and pain, for cruelty and kindness, as the people we were brought up with in our own country.

If intercultural exchange is to advance these aims—of perception and perspective, of empathy and the humanizing of international relations—it cannot be treated as a conventional instrument of a nation's foreign policy. Most emphatically, it cannot be treated as a propaganda program designed to "improve the image" of a country or to cast its current policies in a favorable light. Such exchanges can be regarded as an instrument of foreign policy only in the sense that the cultivation of international perception and perspective is—or ought to be—an important long-term objective of the foreign policy of any country aware of its true national interests as inescapably encompassing regional and international self-interest.

The Secretary in his remarks before the Board of Foreign Scholarships quoted Pericles on the lasting effect of inspiration in terms which could well summarize all intercultural exchanges: The effect "lives on far away, without visible symbol, woven into the stuff of other men's lives."

SENATOR JOE MONTOYA—WATCHDOG OVER FEDERAL PROGRAMS FOR SPANISH-SPEAKING AMERICANS

Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. President, Senator JOSEPH MONTOYA, of New Mexico, our friend and colleague, has sponsored more good legislation to insure that Spanish-speaking Americans get a fair break from the Federal Government than any Senator in the Senate. But while JOE MONTOYA can write the legislation, it takes concerned, active, and tenacious executive branch agencies to carry out the programs.

EXECUTIVE BRANCH FAILS TO CARRY OUT PROGRAM

In an interview in the Federal Times for their December 25 issue, Senator MONTOYA tells us that both the 16-point program for Spanish-speaking Americans and the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish-Speaking People are "pieces of rhetoric for political purposes."

Although the cabinet committee is supposed to meet quarterly with the top people in the Government, Senator MONTOYA says:

They've had no meetings of any meaning and no followthrough.

In 1970, they did not meet at all, and they met only twice in 1971, and only once a year since.

Under its own program, the White House had no Spanish-speaking people at the White House. Now they have improved by 100 percent. They have hired one.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL

What we want in the United States is to insure that every American gets an equal break—for jobs, for education, for Federal employment, for city and state services, and as dignified human beings. We want no special privileges for any but we want equal opportunities for all.

JOE MONTOYA's legislative leadership has been designed to make this day come true. But if administrators do not meet and problems are swept under the table, no number of good laws like JOE MONTOYA's good laws can achieve this purpose and erase a smattering sense of injustice from the minds and hearts of Spanish-speaking Americans.

WATCHDOG FOR SPANISH-SPEAKING AMERICANS

Senator MONTOYA has recognized this problem and has instituted regular oversight examination of the 16-point program and the cabinet committee through his chairmanship of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Treasury, Post Office, and General Government.

We now have both the legislator and the watchdog for the rights of Spanish-speaking Americans in the person of one man, Senator JOSEPH MONTOYA of New Mexico. No one is more dedicated to this cause. No one could do a better job.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the December 25 Federal Times be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

HIRING SPANISH-AMERICANS—JUST A PIECE OF RHETORIC

WASHINGTON.—The Sixteen Point Program for Spanish-speaking Americans "is just a piece of rhetoric for political purposes," Senator Joseph Montoya, D-N.M., said in an interview last week.

The chairman of the appropriations subcommittee on Treasury, Post Office, and General Government said there was no evidence that the White House, under both Presidents Nixon and Ford had demonstrated any leadership in encouraging federal agencies to hire more Spanish speaking persons.

December 19, 1974

"There is a great deal of prejudice in hiring Spanish Americans," he said, "and nothing will improve unless the President becomes a sincere advocate of the program."

The Sixteen Point plan, developed under Nixon four years ago, designed to improve "the shockingly low percentages" of Spanish-speaking Americans in federal employment, "has been badly hamstrung," the senator said.

He cited lack of cooperation between different executive agencies as one of the major obstacles to the program's implementation.

The Civil Service Commission, charged with administering the program, Montoya said, should have asserted itself more "and paid more attention to its role." He did not contemplate removing the program from CSC's aegis.

But he also noted that CSC has not obtained high level administration support in carrying through its responsibilities in this area.

The coordinators for the program, Montoya pointed out, are powerless people—"just receptacles for complaints." Of 88 coordinators, according to the latest statistics, only 44 were Spanish speaking and only 10 percent of them worked full time.

Moreover, most agencies have no guidance on how to implement the program.

The only monitoring of the program, Montoya said, was done at hearings before his committee—and he plans to have more hearings.

Montoya was equally disappointed with the performance of the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish Speaking People. It was created in 1969 under his own sponsorship to serve as a White House advocate for Spanish speaking Americans.

The committee requires participation of Cabinet officers and is mandated by law to meet quarterly.

"They've had no meetings of any meaning, no follow through," Montoya said. He revealed: In 1970 the committee did not meet at all, twice in 1971 "because I raised hell about why they hadn't met," once in 1972 and once the following year.

In addition, Montoya revealed, the committee had degenerated into a political tool for the reelection of Nixon. He based his assertion on statements made by advisory committee members.

"To find out how much commitment the White House had toward the program," Montoya said, "you've got to realize that the White House had no Spanish-speaking person on its rolls under its own program. This year the White House performance improved 100 percent. They've hired one."

He said it was best to ignore the regular government publicity claiming improved opportunities for Spanish speaking Americans. Montoya said their employment in the government had risen from 2.9 percent in 1970 to only 3.1 percent this year. "And most of these employees are janitors."

In the GS level pay system, the percentage of Spanish Americans is lower—2.4 percent, and more than twice that in Wage Grade jobs.

He added that at the supergrade level the Spanish speaking had not even achieved a level of one percent. In May 1973 there were 36 Spanish speaking employees at supergrade levels. In November of the same year the number dropped to 33.

"That is not progress," Montoya said. The median grade level for Spanish speaking Americans is 5.

SENATOR MUSKIE'S ADDRESS ON DÉTENTE

MR. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent address delivered by my friend and colleague from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE). This thoughtful and cogent analysis of the process and goals of détente should be read carefully by those who are both supporters and skeptics of improving Soviet-American relations.

I can only voice my fundamental agreement with Senator MUSKIE that détente is a process—not a single accomplishment, and that mutual restraint in the arms race must remain a focal point of the process. Despite the emphasis often given to improving economic and commercial relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, I believe the most important goal to be achieved is limitation of an arms race which has cost the people of both countries billions of dollars and rubles which can be better spent on the improvement of lives.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. MUSKIE's address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DÉTENTE: THE BALANCE SHEET

(Remarks of Senator EDMUND S. MUSKIE at the Eighth Atlanta Forum on National and International Affairs, Atlanta, Ga., November 14, 1974)

The central foreign policy debate in Washington today concerns the policy of détente: its purpose, its accomplishments, and its future.

It is not an issue which has been widely or passionately debated in our recent political campaigns. In one sense, the American people—beset by inflation, recession, and a massive Watergate hangover—are finding foreign policy issues relatively remote from their day-to-day struggle to make ends meet.

But in another sense, there is an understanding that the state of the world and the quality of our lives at home are interrelated. The effect of world affairs on the average family budget is illustrated by such obvious examples as the price and availability of oil, or the taxes we must pay to provide for our nation's defense in a troubled world community.

The American people understand this relationship. And they also understand that the Soviet-American relationship is a determining factor in the preservation of international stability—or, in a more hostile environment, as an engine of world conflict.

So the debate over détente is something more than an isolated, theoretical argument among foreign policy elites in Washington and New York. The debate has an attentive—and deeply concerned—national audience.

My remarks tonight are intended to be a defense of the policy of détente. At the same time, my views are tempered by a certain respect for the arguments of those skeptics who are on the other side of the issue. We should begin, perhaps, by summarizing the points of view on both sides of the debate.

Secretary Kissinger has described détente as a process, not a permanent achievement. But the process has already produced results—in the form of several U.S.-Soviet arms control agreements; in the Berlin settlement; in negotiations on mutual force reductions in Europe; and in a whole series of cooperative agreements between ourselves and the Soviet Union which have turned Soviet-American relations in a far more positive direction. In short, we have moved from an era of confrontation to an era of negotiation.

Clearly, these limited accomplishments do not guarantee peace. But Kissinger has argued that they have served to lessen the rigidities of the past, setting a new trend which has markedly changed the character of international politics.

The main purpose of détente, from our point of view, is to reduce the sources of potential conflict. The record so far, as Kissinger's critics point out, is mixed. And the future of détente is also uncertain, depending on the outcome of ongoing, difficult negotiations which involve the vital interests of both powers.

But if détente is to survive as the guiding spirit of Soviet-American relations, our negotiations must continue to produce results in several interrelated areas:

First, there must be mutual restraint in the arms race—and a renewed effort at the SALT negotiations to agree on comprehensive and equitable strategic arms limitations at significantly reduced levels.

Second, there must be a satisfactory completion of negotiations on mutual force reductions in Europe, and a positive outcome in the Conference on Europe Security and Cooperation.

Third, there must be new efforts to convert the recently negotiated threshold ban on underground nuclear testing into a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. This must be part of a continuing Soviet-American commitment to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to additional states.

Fourth, there must be mutual restraint in areas of Soviet-American political competition, and a determination to resist all temptations to seek unilateral advantage in crisis situations. In addition, there must be real cooperation in removing the causes of crises—most urgently, for example, in the Middle East.

Fifth, there must be a normalization of U.S.-Soviet trading relations on a basis which provides concrete benefits both to the United States and to the Soviet Union.

The critics of détente are distrustful of Soviet intentions and skeptical that negotiations will produce meaningful results in these areas. They argue that the Soviets view détente simply as a tactic in the continuing struggle against the West. Even the New York Times has argued that the Soviets are much more interested in trade than in the political or military component of détente, and that "the desperate driving impulse of détente is access to Western advanced technology." (New York Times editorial, September 26, 1974.)

So it is not comforting to those of us who have defended détente—and who have urged a normalization of trade relations—to recall Lenin's words in 1921, when he wrote:

"The capitalists of the entire world, and their governments, in the rush of conquering Soviet markets, will close their eyes to the realities, and will thus become blind deaf mutes. They will open credits which will serve as a support for the Communist Party in their countries and will provide us with essential materials and technology thus restoring our military industries, essential for our future victorious attacks on our suppliers. Speaking otherwise, they will be working to prepare their own suicides."

One might dismiss this quote as the rhetorical zeal of another era. Unfortunately, the rhetoric of confrontation has not died with the Cold War. In 1967, Secretary Brezhnev was arguing for détente because, in his words, the Cold War and the confrontation of military blocs "seriously hampers the activity of revolutionary democratic forces," and that "in conditions of slackened tension, the pointer of the political barometer moves left." (Remarks to Communist representatives at Karlovy Vary, April 24, 1967.)

More recently, in June of 1972, Brezhnev told a dinner honoring Fidel Castro that détente "in no way implies the possibility of relaxing ideological struggle. On the contrary, we must be prepared for this struggle to be intensified and becoming an ever sharper form of the confrontation between the systems."

The critics of détente use these quotes as evidence of continued Soviet hostility and as a warning that the Soviets cannot be trusted in any serious negotiations. Skeptical of Soviet intentions, they demand a radical change in Soviet behavior as the price for normalization of trade and any other concessions to Soviet interests. It is here that Secretary Kissinger and his critics part company—over the issue of what we can reasonably demand of the Soviets in exchange for the concrete benefits they seek from détente.

This issue has been at the heart of the controversy over the Jackson amendment to the trade bill—an amendment which I co-sponsored. I felt that the issue of Soviet Jewish emigration was not simply a matter of Soviet internal policy which we should properly ignore. The issue concerned basic human rights which we hold sacred, and it involved the legal question of Soviet observance of an international covenant of which it was a signatory. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations over 24 years ago says specifically, in Article 13, Point 2: "Everyone has a right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country." That declaration is further confirmed in the international convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, ratified by the Supreme Soviet on January 22, 1969.

Further, Article 129 of the "Principles of Civil Legislation of the U.S.S.R. and Union Republics" establishes that international agreements to which Russia is a party override any conflicting domestic legislation. For more than two million Soviet Jews, however, those provisions of international and domestic law have been dead letters. And Soviet leaders would be profoundly mistaken if they under-estimated American feelings on this issue. The concern is not limited to the American Jewish community. It is shared widely throughout our country, and its impact on Congress is heavy. Americans properly perceive existing Soviet restrictions on Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union as being in violation of fundamental human rights and freedoms.

So in this particular instance, I made the judgment that we should withhold enactment of most-favored-nation treatment until the Soviets moderated their policy. This judgment, I think, has now been vindicated by the apparent outcome of the controversy—the recent informal agreement between Secretary Kissinger and Ambassador Dobrynin on the one side, and several members of the Senate on the other, whereby there will be a sizable increase in the number of Soviet Jews permitted to emigrate each year and an end to Soviet harassment of those who apply for emigration. This informal agreement now seems to have cleared the way for early adoption of the trade bill, including nondiscriminatory trade treatment of the Soviet Union.

American idealism is rightly engaged with the question of personal liberties in the Soviet Union, if only because some minimal common moral framework is essential to a stable peace. The practical question for American policy is not whether a degree of pressure for human liberties is warranted, but at what point that pressure may become excessive, and therefore detrimental to its own purpose.

Secretary Kissinger, in recent testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, clearly rejected the view that internal changes in Soviet society must be the precondition for the pursuit of détente. "Our view is different," he said. "We shall insist on responsible international behavior by the Soviet Union and use it as the primary index of our relationship. Beyond this we will use our influence to the maximum to alleviate suffering and to respond to humane appeals. We know what we stand for, and we shall leave no doubt about it." (September 19, 1974)

Despite the apparent success of the Jackson amendment in pressuring the Soviets into constructive policy changes on Jewish emigration, I believe that Secretary Kissinger has articulated an appropriate general guideline for American policy in the future. Clearly, there are limits to what we can demand of the Soviet Union in areas which they regard as matters solely of domestic concern. At the same time, we cannot be indifferent to those aspects of the Soviet system which are repugnant to our own social and political values. But those of us who support the policy of détente believe that the steady normalization of political and economic relations provides the greatest opportunity for bringing about constructive changes in Soviet society in the long run.

This argument was made persuasively before the Foreign Relations Committee recently by the exiled Soviet scientist, Dr. Zhores Medvedev. According to Dr. Medvedev, such influence as the Western countries have acquired upon the internal life of the Soviet Union has come about only because of détente on the official level. "It is the development of these official state ties," said Dr. Medvedev, "of personal, trade, scientific, cultural and social ties and links between statesmen which create the opportunity for Western public opinion to influence the situation in the U.S.S.R." (October 8, 1974)

But even the most effective foreign inducements can exert no more than a marginal influence on the internal life of the Soviet Union. Russia has been a dictatorship throughout its history, for a half-century under the Communists and for many centuries before that under the tsars. As Dr. Medvedev advised the Foreign Relations Committee, "common sense tells us that we cannot escape our different histories."

If Russia is ever to become a free or even liberalized society, it will be the result of internal evolution, of pressures generated from the increasingly assertive professional, managerial and intellectual communities within the Soviet Union. The very fact that voices of protest are now being heard is indicative of progress. In Stalin's time, Solzhenitsyn and Sakharov would have been disposed of before their voices could be heard.

We cannot bring freedom to the Soviet people, but within the limits of prudence and policy, we can offer a measure of hope—the hope inspired by our own good example as exponents and practitioners of freedom. Beyond that, as a matter of common sense and national interest, we must shape our foreign policy as much in awareness of the limits of what we can do as of our hopes and aspirations. We must move back toward the standard embodied in the classic formulation of John Quincy Adams:

"Wherever the standard of freedom and independence has been or shall be unfurled, there will be America's heart, her benedictions, and her prayers. But she goes not abroad in search of monsters to destroy. She is the well wisher to the freedom and independence of all. She is the champion and vindicator only of her own. (Address at Washington, July 4, 1821)

The critics of détente have attacked the move toward normalization of trade relations between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. as providing concrete benefits for the Soviet Union in return for little more than elegant declarations of peace and friendship. Of course the Soviets will benefit. But there is no reason why the United States should not also derive concrete economic benefits from this relationship as well. Moreover, what we seek to achieve from a normalized trading partnership goes beyond an economic balance sheet: we wish to establish the kind of normal, businesslike, cordial dealings which will

The improvident grain sale of 1972 gave trade with Russia a momentarily bad name, but surely the lesson of that experience is not to shun trade but to trade intelligently and profitably. A steadily increasing commerce with the Soviet Union—in foodstuffs, consumer goods and machinery—combined with carefully considered investments and jointly financed resource development projects—would represent a prudent policy, combining profit with political incentive for peace and moderation.

Although the broader purpose of trade may be political, it does not follow at all that we should be guided by anything less than strict economic criteria in our business dealings with the Russians. American businessmen quite legitimately are exploring the adequacy of managerial facilities, and are also requesting relevant economic data which are readily available in most countries but about which the Soviets have been secretive. Close and careful scrutiny must also be given to the soundness of credit arrangements, investment guarantees, and reliability of supply. The latter will be an especially sensitive problem for American investment in Soviet energy sources. In the wake of the recent Arab oil embargo it would seem utterly mistaken to allow ourselves to become heavily dependent on Soviet natural gas or petroleum.

And so I reject the argument of those who have attacked our policy of normalized trade with the Soviet Union. The focus of that attack has been on the question of most-favored-nation trade treatment, which in purely economic terms is a secondary issue. All most-favored-nation actually means is non-discrimination in tariffs; as George Kennan has commented, "It involves no one-sided transfer of funds or goods; no loans, no gifts . . . (no) act of benevolence . . ." In enacting this provision of the Trade Bill, we are doing no more than establishing the same kind of trading relationship with the Soviet Union that we already have with most other nations. In doing so, we will benefit economically, as will the Soviets. And hopefully, the world will also benefit from a deeper commitment of both countries to continued cooperation in political as well as economic affairs.

III.

The future of détente lies above all in the willingness and ability of the United States and the Soviet Union to end the arms race on the basis of an overall equality in strategic forces—preferably at significantly reduced levels.

A continued arms race will undermine the political and economic accommodations we seek. It will undermine our ability to deal constructively with diplomatic crisis. It will add to the already oppressive economic burden on both our peoples.

And yet the arms race goes on, without any rational purpose. It goes on only because of our failure to stop it, and at its end, in the warning of Albert Einstein, whose formula made the atomic bomb possible, "looming ever clearer, lies general annihilation."

If we are to put a stop to the impoverishing arms race, we shall both have to take well-calculated risks, setting aside the chimera of absolute security for a rational goal of the greatest attainable security. The effort to achieve precise equality in strategic arms has turned the Geneva SALT talks into a swamp of futile wrangling over the nuts and bolts of every conceivable weapons system. Variations of geography and national vulnerability give the same weapons systems markedly different significance for the two sides, and the attempt to negotiate these variables into a semblance of strategic symmetry has resulted in the failure thus far to agree on much of anything. In his wise and incisive statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last September 18th, Professor Dean Rusk, who has had experience with the dilemmas of arms control, said that he had "just about reached the conclusion that, if real progress is to be made, the approach must be wholesale rather than retail and must involve dramatic simplicity."

The arms control agreements reached thus far, though not insubstantial, are nonetheless inadequate—somewhat, as Professor Rusk put it, "like building a dam one-eighth of the way across river." The Moscow agreements of 1972 were significant and promising—the ABM treaty limiting each side of two anti-ballistic missile sites, and a five-year interim agreement limiting both land-based and submarine-launched missiles. The Washington summit of 1973 produced only an agreement on "basic principles" for a permanent arms limitation treaty to be concluded by the end of 1974; but that objective has now been abandoned. The Moscow summit of June, 1974 limited each side to one ABM site instead of two—a useful agreement, although neither side wanted a second site anyway.

Beyond that, the 1974 summit was a disheartening failure: abandoning the goal of an early permanent treaty limiting strategic arms, the Soviet Union and the United States agreed only to strive for a new interim decision to last until 1985. In addition the Moscow summit this year produced a "threshold test ban," prohibiting underground nuclear test above 150 kilotons. With the threshold set so high as to leave both sides virtually unimpeded, and with so-called "peaceful" testing—which is technically indistinguishable from military testing—deferred for later regulation, the threshold test ban stands little chance, in its present form, of winning Senate approval.

Of all these agreements only the ABM treaty has major, lasting significance. The abandonment by both sides of the effort to make themselves invulnerable to attack signifies a commitment to coexistence. It can be upset or destabilized by a bid for "first-strike" capacity, but as long as both sides retain their retaliatory power, and each therefore remains certain that an effort to destroy the other would result in its own destruction as well, there can be no conceivable rational reason for either power to launch a nuclear attack. This is the "balance of terror"—a frail foundation for survival—but until and unless a permanent, thoroughgoing agreement to limit strategic arms is reached, it is all that we will have, all that stands between us and armageddon.

Meanwhile the arms race goes on, with no end in sight, at crushing expense to both sides, and with the ever-present possibility of a technological "breakthrough" by one side or the other which might upset the fragile balance of the drawn-out SALT talks, and the prospect of only another interim agreement actually have the effect of accelerating the arms race as both sides strive feverishly to pile up "bargaining chips" for prospective negotiations.

Both the United States and the Soviet Union have played the bargaining chip game. The United States moved ahead with the development of MIRV—and thereby insured that the Soviets would follow suit. The reason it has been impossible to reach an agreement limiting MIRV's is that the Russians are behind and have not the slightest intention of being frozen into a position of inferiority. Clearly, the time to have sought agreement on the multiple warhead missiles was before they reached the testing stage. As "bargaining chips," MIRV's have been worse than a failure: they have actually fueled the arms race.

And now, I fear, the Soviets may be on the verge of accelerating the arms race. Soviet strategic weapons development has continued unabated, not matching the relatively greater restraint exercised more recently on the U.S. side. Only yesterday, the Defense Department's chief scientist warned that "the coming year will probably see the start of the most massive deployment of new strategic nuclear weapons in history" by the Soviet Union. Four new intercontinental-range missiles, the SS-X-16, 17, 18, and 19, are reported now ready for deployment. Moreover, the Soviets are reported to have made significant progress in missile accuracy, including the development of terminal guidance systems, and they have been conducting underground nuclear tests on more powerful warheads for the new missiles.

There is no more certain path to the destruction of detente than a unilateral Soviet effort to gain strategic superiority over the United States. The American people will bear whatever defense burden is necessary to preserve an overall strategic equality. The Soviet leadership would be well-advised to consider this fact carefully before moving ahead to the deployment of a new generation of strategic weapons.

Arms Control is the heart and core of detente, the sine qua non of survival in the nuclear age. As Professor Rusk told the Foreign Relations Committee, "In a world in which thousands of megatons now rest in the hands of frail human beings, the pursuit of agreements which can reduce tensions is not merely good policy but harsh necessity."

Our current primary task in the world is the preservation and stabilization of peace. It is not the kind of peace we once hoped for—the peace of justice and law envisioned in the Covenant of the League of Nations and the United Nations Charter. But that is not within the grasp of our generation. It is rather a peace of the traditional kind—a peace of power politics among uneasy rivals. We may not have to settle for that forever—it probably could not last forever. Sooner or later we shall have to move beyond mere detente, if we are to avoid a nuclear Armageddon.

But for the time being we can do no better than to give agreements substance where we can—first and foremost to end the arms race—while also trying to solidify the personal accommodations of leaders with more durable arrangements, and taking whatever opportunities come our way to inch beyond detente, toward a world of justice and law.

DEATH SENTENCE FOR A SOVIET JEW

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, just in the past few days I have received shocking news that the Soviet Government has imposed the death sentence on a Soviet Jew who has been seeking to emigrate to Israel. The unfortunate victim of this inhuman action is Mikhail Leviev, 56 years old, a resident of Moscow.

Leviev, his wife, and his wife's parents applied to emigrate to Israel in 1971. At that time, he resigned his position as a manager of a department store in Moscow. In early 1972, the family received exit visas. Shortly before their scheduled departure, Leviev was arrested, and held for "investigation" until 1974. In the meanwhile, his in-laws did emigrate to Israel, but his wife remains in Moscow.

Mikhail Leviev was tried this month by the city court of Moscow, and convicted of swindling and stealing state property. On December 8, he was sentenced to death for these economic crimes. This is the first sentence of death for economic crimes in over a decade, although these economic crimes have been frequently used to harass people seeking to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

I am shocked and deeply disturbed by the Leviev case. Just today the Congress of the United States is completing action on the Trade Act of 1974, which will permit the extension of economic credits, and most-favored-nation status to the U.S.S.R. It is our understanding in the Congress that coincident with this action the Soviet Government will ease its policy on emigration from the U.S.S.R., with particular emphasis on expediting exit visas, and ending various harassments of those who seek to emigrate. It was my hope that this agreement would lead to a strengthening of detente, and to significant progress on humanitarian concerns in the U.S.S.R.

Unfortunately, I have received persistent reports, over the 2 months since the agreement on the Jackson amendment was revealed, that Soviet harassment of Jews and others seeking to emigrate has increased rather than lessened. The horrendous example of the sentence of death against an innocent man, seeking to emigrate to Israel, is a tragic escalation of these trends, which can serve no purpose other than to set back the cause of detente. I, and all the other Members of the House and Senate, who cosponsored the Jackson amendment, have made clear that we will be carefully watching the activities of the Soviet Government in the next 18 months, pending the decision on extending MFN and trade credits. I will say at this time that the imposition of this death sentence is a serious setback to my support for the trade benefits which the Congress has authorized; carrying out of the sentence would be absolutely unconscionable and in direct contravention of the agreements as I understand them.

I speak out on this matter not only because I have been deeply concerned about emigration from the Soviet Union, and full implementation of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, but also because the imposition of a death sentence for such a minor crime is totally inhuman, no matter what country would have done it. I intervened on humanitarian grounds earlier this year when the Chilean Government sentenced to death a number of military officers for alleged treason in connection with the 1973 coup, and also with the Philippine Government in a similar case. Thus, for purely humanitarian reasons, I hope the Soviet Government will undo this tragic miscarriage of justice.

Mr. President, having brought this most unfortunate matter to the attention of my colleagues, I hope that they will join me in contacting the Soviet Government to urge that the death sentence against Mikhail Leviev be rescinded. I have today sent a telegram to Ambassador Dobrynin expressing this message, which I strongly feel is essential to continued good relations between our two nations.

SENATOR RANDOLPH URGES PRESIDENT TO SIGN SURFACE MINING LEGISLATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, as a Senator from our country's largest coal producing State, I am concerned for the continuing uncertainty that plagues the future of the American coal industry. If we are to cope with the energy crisis facing our Nation and achieve any significant degree of energy self-sufficiency, it is requisite that we formulate a comprehensive national fuels and energy policy. More importantly, it is essential that we now establish a definitive Federal policy governing surface mining and the reclamation of surface mined lands.

During the last 4 years, the Congress has worked closely with the administration and industry as well as environmentalists on legislation governing the reclamation of surface mined lands. In these discussions every attempt has been made to formulate a Federal policy which assures an equitable balance between meeting our country's future needs for secure energy supplies and national concerns for environmental quality.

It is my considered judgment that the policies set forth in S. 425, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1974, are consistent with both these national goals. I am, therefore, disturbed by reports that President Ford is considering vetoing this vital measure. I also recognize that there is a disparity of opinion within both Government and industry on the potential adverse impact of this legislation. Nevertheless, this measure does represent a reasoned attempt to cope with this national problem; it achieves an equitable balance between energy and environmental concerns. The policies set forth are predicated on implementation by reasonable government officials.

Enactment of this measure, at this time, is essential to providing certainty where uncertainty in Federal policy is serving as a constraint on the development of new domestic coal supplies.

For these reasons, yesterday I urged the President to approve S. 425, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1974. I ask unanimous consent that the text of my telegram appear in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 18, 1974.

THE PRESIDENT,

The White House,

Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I strongly urge your affirmative action on S. 425, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1974, approved by the Congress earlier this week.

As a Senator from our country's largest coal producing State, I am deeply concerned for the uncertainty that plagues the future of this energy industry. If we are to cope with the energy crisis facing our Nation, it is essential that a definitive Federal policy governing surface mining be enunciated at this time.

During the last 4 years the Congress and the administration have engaged in extensive deliberation on legislation establishing Federal policies to govern surface mining and reclamation of surface mined land. In these discussions every attempt has been made to assure an equitable balance is achieved between meeting our country's needs for secure energy supplies, and also national concerns for environmental quality.

It is my considered judgement that the policies in S. 425 are consistent with national goals to promote development of domestic coal resources to meet our country's future energy requirements, as well as increased energy self-sufficiency. I recognize that there is a disparity of opinion within both Government and industry on the adverse impact of this legislation. Never the less, this measure represents a reasoned attempt to cope with this national problem, which is predicated on implementation by reasonable Government officials.

I reiterate my support for your approval of this vital measure.

With esteem, I am,

Truly,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

KEEPING EXPERTS ON "TAP" NOT ON "TOP"

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a few months ago, I issued a statement warning Congress and the public to beware of the government expert. I stated that the watchword should be "keep the experts on tap but not on top."

Neither government scientists, economists, housing experts nor the military brass can be counted on to give Congress objective, scientific, or infallible judgments. Instead their advice is too often subject, biased, and just dead wrong. Their opinions should be taken with a grain of salt.

Since that time, I have come to believe that my warning should not be limited to government experts only. Rather, beware of experts in any field.

To confirm my admonition, I would like to quote in its entirety an article from the Journal of Medical Education describing an experiment in which the experts were out-experted. An actor was hired to give an articulate, but thoroughly nonsensical lecture entitled "Mathematical Game Theory as Applied to Physician Education" to audiences of psychiatrists, psychologists, educators, and administrators. These experts answered questionnaires following the double-talk lecture which indicated that they were stimulated to think, that they learned, that they believed the material was well organized and presented in an interesting manner, and in several cases, that they had even read the fictitious Dr. Fox's prior publications.

The implications of the "Dr. Fox" lecture and its ready acceptance by supposed "experts" are far-reaching. As Congressmen and Senators hear "expert witnesses" day after day at hearings, we must exercise extreme scrutiny and detachment. Consider the implications of exercising such scrutiny in advertising. Dr. Fox certainly sold himself to people who should have known better. There is most certainly need for consumer oriented research and protection. In the discipline of education, think of the critical need for developing valid criteria for use in evaluating educational programs and teaching methods. The Dr. Fox syndrome evokes many questions about our perceptions and our vulnerability to the "expert." Let us learn from it.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record the article from Journal of Medical Education, excerpts from the original Dr. Fox script, and my press release on experts of July 3, 1974.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE DR. FOX LECTURE: A PARADIGM OF EDUCATIONAL SEDUCTION

The article is based on a paper presented at the 11th Annual Conference on Research in Medical Education at the 83rd Annual Meeting of the AAMC, Miami Beach, Florida, November 6, 1972.

(Dr. Naftulin is associate professor and director of the Division of Continuing Education in Psychiatry, University of Southern California School of Medicine; Mr. Ware is assistant professor of medical education and health care planning and director of research and evaluation, Southern Illinois University School of Medicine; Mr. Donnelly is an instructor in psychiatry (psychology) in the USC Division of Continuing Education in Psychiatry.)

Abstract—On the basis of publications supporting the hypothesis that student ratings of educators depend largely on personality variables and not educational content, the authors programmed an actor to teach charismatically and nonsensitively on a topic about which he knew nothing. The authors hypothesized that given a sufficiently impressive lecture paradigm, even experienced educators participating in a new learning experience can be seduced into feeling satisfied that they have learned despite irrelevant, conflicting, and meaningless content conveyed by the lecturer. The hypothesis was supported when 55 subjects responded favorably at the significant level to an eight-item questionnaire concerning their attitudes toward the lecture. The study serves as an example to educators that their effectiveness must be evaluated beyond the satisfaction with which students view them and raises the possibility of training actors to give "legitimate" lectures as an innovative approach toward effective education. The authors conclude by emphasizing that student satisfaction with learning may represent little more than the illusion of having learned.

Teaching effectiveness is difficult to study since so many variables must be considered in its evaluation. Among the obvious are the education, social background, knowledge of subject matter, experience, and personality of the educator. It would seem that an educator with the proper combination of these and other variables would be effective. However, such a combination may result in little more than the educator's ability to satisfy students, but not necessarily educate them.

Getzels and Jackson (1) have stated that the personality of the teacher might be the most significant variable in the evaluation of teaching effectiveness. Wallen and Travers (2) also supported this concept in stating that "we have tried to demonstrate that patterns of teacher behavior and the teaching methods they represent are mainly the products of forces which have little to do with scientific knowledge of learning."

Similarly, Goffman (3) viewed audience receptivity to a lecturer as highly influenced by the person introducing him as well as by the quality of the introduction. In addition, Goffman described an audience as influenced by the speaker's "involuntary expressive behavior" as much as by the expressed information he wished to convey. This is especially so if the audience has little time to evaluate the information. Consequently, the learner's impression of the information conveyed becomes a decisive factor in how he responds to the information conveyed.

Rogers (3) stressed the importance of humanizing our educational institutions by bringing "together the cognitive and the affective-experiential" aspects of learning. He also discussed the significance of the educator's genuineness. He feels that the educator who does not present a facade is more likely to be effective. The educator, states Rogers, must have a "direct, personal encounter with the learner."

In one study (4) in which student perceptions of educators in 1,427 seventh through 12th grade classes were factor analyzed, it was reported that the students regarded "teacher charisma or popularity" as the most important characteristic when rating teachers. The article further states that "students do not respond directly to specific questions regarding teacher effectiveness. Rather a kind of halo effect on teacher charisma or popularity determines to a large extent how students react to questions about their teacher."

If charisma or popularity have such an effect on the rating of teachers by junior high and high school students, the authors wondered whether the ratings of a highly trained group of professional educators in a learning situation might be similarly influenced. If that were the case, a demonstration of the personality factor in perceived learning might serve to arouse the group members' concern about the proper combination of style and substance in their own teaching.

The hypothesis for this study was as follows. Given a sufficiently impressive lecture paradigm, an experienced group of educators participating in a new learning situation can feel satisfied that they have learned despite irrelevant, conflicting, and meaningless content conveyed by the lecturer.

To test the hypothesis, the authors selected a professional actor who looked distinguished and sounded authoritative; provided him with a sufficiently ambiguous title, Dr. Myron L. Fox, an authority on the application of mathematics to human behavior; dressed him up with a fictitious but impressive curriculum vitae and presented him to a group of highly trained educators.

The lecture method was the teaching format selected since it is one used extensively in the professional educational setting. It has been described as the one teaching method during which most of the time the instructor talks to the students (1). Its acceptance as an effective teaching tool is attributable mainly to its time-testedness.

Dr. Fox's topic was to be "Mathematical Game Theory as Applied to Physician Education." His source material was derived from a complex but sufficiently understandable scientific article geared to lay readers (5). One of the authors, on two separate occasions, coached the lecturer to present his topic and conduct his question and answer period with an excessive use of double talk, neologisms, non sequiturs, and contradictory statements. All this was to be interspersed with parenthetical humor and meaningless references to unrelated topics.

GROUP I

Eleven psychiatrists, psychologists, and social-worker educators who were gathered for a teacher training conference in continuing education comprised the learner group. The purpose of the conference was to help this group be more effective educators of other health professionals by providing them various instructional goals, media, and experiences. Dr. Fox was introduced as "the real McCoy" to this unsuspecting group; and he presented his one-hour lecture in the manner described, followed by a half hour discussion period which was hardly more substantive.

At the end of his performance an authentic looking satisfaction questionnaire was distributed to which all 11 mental health educators were asked to respond anonymously (Table 1). The introduction of the lecturer as well as his lecture and discussion were videotaped for use with other groups.

Significantly more favorable than unfavorable responses to the questionnaire were obtained (χ^2 -square = 35.96, $p < .001$). The one item with most favorable responses was the first, "Did he dwell upon the obvious?" It was the feeling of half the group that he did. The remaining items received a majority of favorable responses. No respondent reported having read Dr. Fox's publications. Subjective responses included the following:

"Excellent presentation, enjoyed listening. Has warm manner. Good flow, seems enthusiastic. What about the two types of games, zero-sum and non-zero sum? Too intellectual a presentation. My orientation is more pragmatic."

Because the first group was few in number and quite select, the authors sought other subjects with similar experience and professional identity who might provide further data to test the hypothesis.

The second group consisted of 11 subjects who were psychiatrists, psychologists, and psychiatric social workers, all identified as mental health educators. A videotape of the previously described lecture and discussion period as well as the preparatory introduction was shown to the group. After the presentation group members responded to it using the same questionnaire as did the first group (Table 1). Favorable responses far outweighed unfavorable responses, and the difference between the two was (χ^2 -square = 64.53, $p < .001$). All responded favorably to the first item, which means that they felt he did not "dwell upon the obvious." There were also significantly more favorable than unfavorable responses to the other items and one respondent reported having read the lecturer's publications. Some subjective statements were:

"Did not carry it far enough. Lack of visual materials to relate it to psychiatry. Too much gesturing. Left out relevant examples. He misses the last few phrases which I believe would have tied together his ideas for me." Still more subjects were sought to further test the hypothesis.

GROUP III

The third group was different in that it consisted of 33 educators and administrators enrolled in a graduate level university educational philosophy course. Of the 33 subjects in this group, 21 held master's degrees, eight had bachelor's degrees, and four had other degrees which were not specified. Most of these educators were not specifically mental health professionals but had been identified as having counseling experience in their respective schools. The videotape of the lecture was again presented to this group, after which the educators responded to it by using the same questionnaire as the first two groups (Table 1).

TABLE 1.—EXAMPLES OF QUESTIONS USED AND PERCENTAGE OF RESPONSES¹ FOR 3 GROUPS

Questions	Group I		Group II		Group III		Questions	Group I		Group II		Group III
	Yes	No	Yes	No	Yes	No		Yes	No	Yes	No	Yes	No
Did he dwell upon the obvious?	50	50	0	100	28	72	Did he put his material across in an interesting way?	90	10	82	18	81	19
Did he seem interested in his subject?	100	0	91	9	97	3	Have you read any of this speaker's publications?	0	100	9	91	0	100
Did he use enough examples to clarify his material?	90	10	64	36	91	9	Specify any other important characteristics of his presentation
Did he present his material in a well organized form?	90	10	82	18	70	30
Did he stimulate your thinking?	100	0	91	9	87	13

Again the number of favorable responses was significantly greater than the number of unfavorable responses (χ^2 -square=102.83, $p < .001$). The majority of respondents from Group III also did not feel the lecturer dwelt upon the obvious, and they also responded favorably for the most part to the other items. Subjective responses, when given, were again interesting. Some were:

"Lively examples. His relaxed manner of presentation was a large factor in holding my interest. Extremely articulate. Interesting, wish he dwelled more on background. Good analysis of subject that has been personally studied before. Very dramatic presentation. He was certainly captivating. Somewhat disorganized. Frustratingly boring. Unorganized and ineffective. Articulate. Knowledgeable."

Given the responses of these three groups of educators to the lecture paradigm, the authors believe that the study hypothesis has been supported.

DISCUSSION

The notion that students, even if they are professional educators, can be effectively "seduced" into an illusion of having learned if the lecturer stimulates a style of authority and wit is certainly not new. In a terse but appropriate statement on educators, Postman and Weingartner (6) emphasized that "it is the sign of a competent crap detector that he is not completely captivated by the arbitrary abstractions of the community in which he happened to grow up." The three groups of learners in this study, all of whom had grown up in the academic community and were experienced educators, obviously failed as "competent crap detectors" and were seduced by the style of Dr. Fox's presentation. Considering the educational sophistication of the subjects, it is striking that none of them detected the lecture for what it was.

In addition to testing the hypothesis, the paradigm was to provide these professional educators with an example of being educationally seduced and to demonstrate that there is much more to teaching than making students happy. A balanced combination of knowledge and personality are needed for effective teaching even if the student does not require the former to sustain the illusion that he has learned. It is hoped that this experience has helped respondents from these three groups to question their educational effectiveness more meaningfully.

To the authors' knowledge a simulated teaching paradigm such as this with student responses to subsequently perceived learning has not been reported. Despite the usual reservations about generalizing data from only 55 subjects, the results of the study raise some interesting questions. The first involves the content of the lecture. Does a topic seemingly short on content and long on ambiguity or abstraction lend itself more readily to such a lecture paradigm than a content-

Opening. "There are several advantages I've noticed in coming from California. The first being that you can wear shorts (the Easterners wear suits) and that you can wear a mock turtle neck shirt where we wear a tux." . . .

Second Page. "Now, this games theory, translated or carried on to its next step, is obviously no good in a dog fight. The motivation of a fight is hostility. The goal is to totally eliminate the opponent. This is not true in games. In games, the idea is to outlogic the opponent. If you will, to reduce that fight to a level of more amicable confrontation and this, gentlemen, I think is perhaps where the value of game theory lies in our profession. Pursuing instead the theory of games and how it pictures the value of a game, the value of parlor games as games is that they are instances of formalized conflict."

Games are instances of formalized conflict. You have not, as I've said, you don't get the optimum strategy but you get a choice of many strategies. In a sense, medically, one might say a patient comes in and says, "Dr., I have a pain." And you say the element of chance is that he has one of x, y, and z. Most people who come in, between the ages of 25 and 45, with a pain in that area suffer from this particular disease. And so you say, "Fine, this is my diagnosis," after the normal procedure of the clinic."

Games wouldn't help you there because games says you have to go into more possibilities. In a sense, it is the application, if you will, of general systems where the entire man, the entire thing is discussed in relation to the illness of that patient. And certainly in the area of mental illness or in the training of those who have to involve themselves with mental illness, this has enormous value. Now, I would like to give a couple of specific examples of game theories. We've seen in chess where there is a man to man situation. One must lose."

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) in a statement from his Washington office Wednesday warned Congress and the public to "beware of the government expert. The watchdog should be, keep the experts on tap but not on top."

Proxmire is Vice Chairman of the Congressional Joint Economic Committee and Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee with jurisdiction over Housing, the National Science Foundation, and the Space Agency.

"Neither government scientists, economists, housing experts, or the military brass can be counted on to give Congress objective scientific, or infallible judgements. Instead their advice is too often subjective, biased, and just dead wrong. Their opinions should be taken with a grain of salt. Here are some reasons why:

"Defense. Congress is told by the experts at the Pentagon that we cannot cut a dime from the massive $95 billion total national defense budget. When we attack requests for new carriers, the B-1 bomber, or the MBT tank the military experts tell us that mere Congressmen or Senators should not interpose their judgments in an area which only the highly trained military brass can understand."

"At the same time a group of outside experts composed of former Deputy Secretary of Defense Roswell Gilpatric, former Assistant Secretaries of Defense Paul Warnke and Alfred B. Fitt, and men like Admiral Gene LaRocque, Vice Admiral John M. Lee, and Brigadier General Douglas Kinnard have told us we could reduce this year's military budget by $14.9 billion without weakening the defense of the country at all."

"The Pentagon experts have a vested interest in getting their money and running a big program. Are they really merely unbiased experts?"

"Nutrition. The experts who advise the Food and Drug Administration (The Food and Nutrition Board of the National Academy of Science) officially tell us that the so-called Recommended Daily Dietary Allowance of Vitamin C for adults is 45 milligrams a day. After next January, if the FDA has its way, Vitamin C in amounts more than 150 percent of that amount, or 67.5 grams, will be regulated and sold as a drug."

"But the Nobel Laureate Dr. Linus Pauling advocates that individuals use many many times—tens of times—the amount proposed by the Food and Drug Administration and its stable of orthodox nutritionists."

"Furthermore, a very thorough double blind trial done in Canada with about a thousand people and reported in detail in the Canadian Medical Association Journal for September 23, 1972 indicates that there were statistically significant results—with fewer illnesses, shorter durations of illnesses, fewer doctor visits, and fewer days lost from work—with that half of the group who routinely took 500 milligrams of Vitamin C a day instead of a placebo."

"Here we have outside scientists recommending that people take 50 to 100 times the amount of Vitamin C which the Food and Drug Administration recommends."

"The problem is not that the FDA may well be wrong. The problem is that they have taken one side of a scientific dispute and have written it into law. That's not science. That's bureaucracy, stupidity, and wrong-headedness all wrapped into one."

"Economics. There's an old saying that if you laid all the economists in the world end to end they would never reach a decision. But this year the problem has not been 'no' decisions but 'wrong' decisions."

"The government economists were just dead wrong about the rate of inflation, the budget deficit, the price of oil, the price of food, and dozens of other vital economic predictions. This year more than any other proved why Carlyle called economics the 'dismal science.'"

"Housing. The experts at the Department of Housing and Urban Development have told us to scrap all the old housing programs and substitute a new leased housing program called Section 23 instead. But the builders who, under the program will not only have to build the units but are required to manage the units, select the tenants, and collect the rents, say it won't work. The builders, who have to put up the money and take the risks, may know far more about it than the so-called experts who plan programs on paper but are not required to run them."

SENATOR MONDALE AND THE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

Mr. NELSON, Mr. President, it is rare in our political system when a serious and increasingly well-received contender for his party's Presidential nomination renounces all ambition for the Presidency on the ground that he does not have the "overwhelming desire" for the office "that is essential for the kind of campaign that is required."

That is what our colleague from Minnesota, Senator MONDALE, did recently, and in doing so he surprised many of his own friends and supporters.

Senator MONDALE'S unusual act said a great deal about him and a great deal about the way in which we choose Presidents. Fortunately, both of these points caught the notice of many reporters and editorial writers around the country and resulted in a number of thoughtful and perceptive commentaries. It is these I would like to share with my colleagues, because regardless of how one regarded Senator MONDALE'S potential candidacy, his unique reasons for withdrawing from the Presidential race and the questions those reasons raise about our political process deserve our attention.

Saul Pett, of the Associated Press, wrote perhaps the most revealing article on this matter, and I ask unanimous consent, that it be printed in the RECORD together with a number of editorials and commentaries from newspapers throughout the country.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Grand Forks Herald, Dec. 1, 1974]
MONDALE FEARED HE MAY HAVE TO "TURN AND TWIST" AS CANDIDATE

(By Saul Pett)

WASHINGTON.—The long, numbing hours of the campaign. The lack of time to think, the snap judgments reached out of fatigue. The need to impress strangers. The effort to remake his personality, the fear he might have to "turn and twist" himself "out of shape."

Walter Mondale, the attractive senator from Minnesota who might have provided the Democrats with a fresh face, added it all up. He decided he didn't want to be President of the United States that badly.

He quickly adds that he does not object to the demanding system by which we nominate and elect presidents. He says he "admires" those who can endure it. It is just not for Walter Mondale.

"I also reject the notion that the system will automatically produce someone who is sort of obsessed or twisted," he says. "I don't think that has to be. Mr. Nixon was, of course. But I don't think politics ruined Nixon. I think Nixon nearly ruined politics."

Mondale withdrew last week after a year of exploring his possibilities around the country. While he still had miles to go before becoming a household word, he had risen in the polls from almost total obscurity.

In the beginning, he had to fight jokes about the only Mondale anybody had ever heard of was a suburb of Los Angeles. He ranked so low in the polls, he recalled, he was ready to issue a debate challenge to "Don't Know," who was running two points ahead.

After a year of travel and speaking and campaigning for Democrats in other states, and specially after Sen. Edward Kennedy withdrew, Mondale appeared to be the favorite of northern liberals. Admittedly the field was sparse. Among all Democrats, according to one poll, he was tied with Sen. Henry Jackson as having the best chance to beat President Ford. Neither was close to Ford but Mondale had come up from the pack.

Still, he said, he had the same doubts he had from the beginning about whether he really wanted to run for President. His feelings went up and down. At one point, the day after Kennedy withdrew, Mondale was "99 per cent" certain he wanted to run. Last week, the one per cent prevailed.

"I just didn't have the overwhelming desire you need to do all the things you have to go to get nominated and elected," he concluded. "I had to get all the way in or all the way out."

"I was at a point where I would have to go to people in the Senate, in the House, governors, political leaders and leaders in other fields and ask them to commit themselves to me publicly. How could I honestly ask them to do that, to pledge part of their careers to me, when I had these doubts myself?"

So he got all the way out. He insists other candidates or his own chances were not a major factor. He decided he'd be happiest remaining a senator. He decided he really didn't have the stomach for a run at the White House.

Why not?

"The absolutely unbelievable schedules, the 18-hour days, the weekends. Above all, there's no time to sit down and think through an issue, to read books and other things you should, to test and probe an idea to be sure you're on the right track, to talk with leaders in the field. That has always been my way. I'm just uncomfortable with the snap judgements that one makes when you're tired or don't have a chance to think things through."

"Also, national politics has a lot of theater to it. In Minnesota, I'm with friends, almost part of a family. I don't have to put on airs. If I do, they'll resent it. If I don't speak well but makes sense, that's fine enough for them. It's a nice reassuring, comfortable feeling."

"Politically, the 47-year-old Mondale has led a relatively sheltered life in his own state. In 1960, he was appointed state Attorney general and then won election and reelection. In 1964, he was appointed to the senate term vacated by his mentor and his party's nominee for vice president, Hubert Humphrey. Mondale was elected in 1968 and re-elected in 1972. He has never had to run as anything but an incumbent."

He found national campaigning far different.

"So much of the time you're with people who don't know you," Mondale said in a shirt-sleeved interview in his Senate office. "You're appearing before them for the first and perhaps only time. There is this pressure to perform, to impress, that I found very uncomfortable. Maybe I'm not very good at it."

"The suggestion always was: You're a fine man but you really need to comb your hair differently; you need different kinds of suits; what you need is a speech instructor (I probably do); what you need is two hours in a Hollywood studio. It is a form of remake I don't like."

"Anyway, there are many different ways to serve. Not everyone has to be president or can be. I'm fortunate to be a senator."

Doesn't campaigning for the Senate require some "remaking?"

"No. One campaign hard for the Senate but there's time to think. Besides, I can be myself. I'd better be in Minnesota. I don't have to be remade. There's a wonderful sense of joy to it, a satisfaction. You have to be a politician to realize the joys and support and good feeling that come with it."

Running for president, was he beginning to dislike himself?

"I don't think so."

Was he getting close to the edge?

"Well, you start thinking about it."

Did he worry that a presidential campaign would bring great pressure to waffle or compromise on his principles?

"I don't think I did any of that. Anyway, the wafflers are in for a big surprise. The things that seemed to get me the most support were the things I spoke most clearly about. When I was asked if I'd run with George Wallace and said no, people liked that. People are so tired of the manure put out by politicians that they'll often come to your banner just because you say something even when they don't agree with it."

Having tried it for a year, having decided finally he didn't want it badly enough, what were the joys of not running for president?

"First of all, I went deer hunting in Minnesota. I love the woods. I went back to the woods for three days and talked to the chickadees, the hawks, the squirrels. I listened to the wind and watched the snow come down. I can't tell you how that felt. It was just marvelous."

Mondale chuckled.

"Then I went home and I said to my wife, 'Joan, I'm sorry to be such a burden being home like this. I introduced myself to my children. Now I'm going home again tonight. I'm going to be with my family. I've got a book I'm going to read. I'm going to call a bunch of old friends and just talk. It's going to be a nice weekend.'"

And in the manner of a man who clearly won't, Walter Mondale of Minnesota added, "I'm going to miss all those Holiday Inns."

SENATOR MONDALE'S EXIT

People have ducked in and out of the presidential running before; indeed, the mid-campaign renunciation of ambition has become a staple of our politics. But it is hard to remember a statement of this kind that was more candid than that made by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) on Thursday in announcing his decision to end his quest for the Democratic presidential nomination—or one that was based on a sounder principle. For the plain fact is that the ordeal connected with seeking and acquiring the presidential nomination of one of the major parties tends to work as a valuable test of both the candidate's commitment to serve in the office of President and his capacity to organize a national enterprise and to create the required coalition of national political interests.

To say as much, however, is not to endorse or even admire the particular nature of the ordeal which has become associated with the quest for the American presidency in recent years—and that is the point. It is one thing to believe, as we do, that the trials and rigors of seeking the office can be an intimate part of demonstrating one's fitness for it, and quite another to believe that the candidates' exertions are being put to good use under our present costly, quirky and accident-prone system. As David Broder put it in a column on this page last month, "No sane person can survive, with his reason intact and his personality unwarped, the hideous, ludicrous, endurance course that now passes for a presidential selection process."

Mr. Broder's observation came at the end of several paragraphs describing the frantic and demeaning peregrinations of a collection of would-be candidates (including Sen. Mondale) as they tried to press their way to the attention of the media, the public and the party faithful.

Some of the elements contributing to the oddity and wastefulness of the process are probably past remedy. Others may be, at bottom, self-imposed conditions that owe more to fashion and trend and misconception of political necessities than to actual need: the JFK pattern of success, memorialized in literature and legend, has become a kind of model since 1960—and one that implies a protracted, costly, primary-by-primary campaign.

To complicate things further, it is also possible that reforms affecting particular parts of the process of selecting our Presidents could have the general effect of making ing life more arduous for the individual candidate. We are thinking here of the alterations in the Democratic Party's delegate and nominee selection procedures whose effect could conceivably be to require an even more painstaking and prolonged state-by-state endeavor on the part of prospective nominees.

Nevertheless, there are some institutional actions possible that could go a certain way toward rationalizing the process itself. The recently enacted federal campaign financing legislation is an example of what can be done. There is also, kicking around on the Hill, legislation addressed to bringing a degree of order and practicality to the scheduling of state primary elections with a view to 1) shortening the overall campaign-to-convention-to-election day time period and 2) eliminating the marathon race aspects of the primaries by grouping them regionally and/or on certain specified days. And at their forthcoming miniconvention, the Democrats themselves will have an opportunity to endorse moves to regularize the timing of state delegate selection procedures. These are ideas that seem to us to be at least worth exploring as the country heads into another of its two-year election campaigns for a four-year term of office.

You will have noticed that there is one institution we haven't mentioned yet: the press. Here we leave the area where legislation is either desirable or lawful, but that is hardly to say that a little introspection and self-restraint and intellectual rigor are not in order. We do not have a candidate for election, but we certainly have a candidate for extinction, and that is the whole panoply of horseracing images—front-runner and the rest—that quadratically deform political reporting and distort the meaning of what is taking place. Front-runners slip, dark-horses make unexpected gains and the whole procedure sooner or later tends to become a kind of national sports event with its own built-in needs for surprise, reversal and "neck-and-neck" competition. Also, the members of the press (despite so much of what you hear these days) being human, there are certain points where trend and fashion overwhelm interpretation of events as they are, so that in addition to the roller coaster ride of the primaries and state nominating conventions themselves, the candidates are treated to a simultaneous seesaw ride of press expectations: they are up, they are down, they are up again—and so on.

It would be enough to make almost anyone dizzy, but that in itself is not a particularly good test of character, endurance, toughness or a capacity to engage and hold the political loyalties of divergent groups of Americans. We think Sen. Mondale is right about the importance of the ordeal. But we think a national effort can and should be undertaken to make the ordeal a more relevant one.

"I LISTENED TO THE WIND"

Walter F. Mondale's name is no longer on the list of Democrats who want to be President.

For almost a year, the 47-year-old Minnesota senator had been traveling around the country, trying to make his name better known. He spoke for other Democrats in the off-year elections. He held news conferences. He shook the hands of thousands of people he had never seen before and would never see again. But for all his work it wasn't going well.

"Mondale is hardly a household word," he would joke. "Most people think it's a city just outside Los Angeles." The public opinion polls gave him little chance of winning the Democratic nomination, and he was ready to issue a debate challenge to "Don't Know," who was always running just ahead of him.

Finally, he began to doubt what he was doing. "I just didn't have the overwhelming desire you need to do all the things you have to do to get nominated and elected . . . The absolutely unbelievable schedules, the 18-hour days and the weekends away from home. There's no time to sit down and think through an issue or to read a book."

Nor did Mondale like the way people were trying to change him. He was told to comb his hair differently to dress more modishly and to go to a Hollywood studio and learn how to act in front of a camera. And worse, he was told he ought to modify his positions on public issues to make them more acceptable to more Democrats.

And just at the time Mondale was beginning to balk at all this, his chances began to look better. His fellow senator from Minnesota—Hubert H. Humphrey—came out for him. His close friend—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts—withdrew from the race and left Mondale the favorite of liberal Democrats.

Suddenly, the polls had Mondale tied with Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington as the Democrat with the best chance of defeating President Ford.

And, just as suddenly, Mondale threw it all away. He said he would rather be himself than be President. "I made the decision on a deer-hunting trip in the Minnesota woods. I love the woods. I went back there for three days and talked to the chickadees, the hawks and the squirrels. I listened to the wind and watched the snow come down. It was just marvelous."

Then he went home and "introduced myself to my children" and "told my wife I was sorry to have been such a burden."

We don't know how Mondale would have done if he had stuck with it all the way. But we do know this: The republic has less to fear from a Mondale, who didn't want the Presidency enough, than from those who have wanted it too much.

MONDALE WITHDRAWAL MAY HURT DEMOCRATS

(By Chuck Stone)

Senator Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) is one of the few men in the U.S. Senate who has shared the abolitionist Wendell Phillips' passion for racial justice, but contradicts Phillips' view about Presidential candidates.

"You can always get the truth from an American statesman," wrote Phillips, "after he has turned 70 or given up all hope of the Presidency."

Mondale's reputation for honesty has long been as widely known as it has been highly regarded. His withdrawal as a Democratic presidential candidate will in no way alter his legislative integrity.

Yet, the decision by half of the Senate's "Minnesota Twins" (the other half, Senator Hubert H. Humphrey) not to seek the presidency damages the Democratic party's reputation as the party of liberalism and reform.

To the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, the depressing loss of Mondale's candidacy narrows an already badly impoverished field of acceptable candidates.

The only declared liberal candidate is Representative Morris K. Udall who whimsically described his candidacy as "lean." Yon lanky Arizonian does indeed have a "lean and hungry look" and one wonders how well his liberalism will stand up under the reactionary assaults of the other three leading Democratic candidates—a racist and mentally limited Gov. George Wallace, a saber-rattling manipulator, Senator Henry M. Jackson and an all-things-to-all-people opportunistic Senator Lloyd Bentsen of Texas.

But Mondale's withdrawal poses a larger problem than the mere loss until now of the most attractive and viable liberal candidate. He represents another statesman who has rejected the American dream of one day growing up to become president. There are any number of men—and women—out there of superior intellect, high moral character and compassion for people. Yet, none of them wants to be president.

One man I deeply admire as one of the country's most authentic liberals and warm-hearted humanitarians—Wisconsin's Senator Gaylord Nelson—has persistently repudiated efforts by associates to mount a presidential draft for him. Nelson and Mondale are close friends. "Fritz was Gaylord's candidate," laughed Nelson's wife, Carrie Lee, in her soft Southern accent. Now, the two friends are noncandidates.

What is it about the descending star of the presidency that only the most savage mediocrities in our midst—Wallace, Jackson, Bentsen and Udall—emerge as the "leading" candidates? My God, we used to have to worry about choosing from Adlai Stevensons, Wendell Wilkies, Eugene McCarthy and Earl Warrens.

The presidency's power and majesty may be entering, as George E. Reedy suggests, a "twilight" period. Or it may have been twisted into an ominously different form unintended by the founding fathers—what Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., calls the "Imperial Presidency." Or the office may have been transformed into what another author, Fred Feinfield, labeled as the "Biggest Job in the World."

If so, how many honest and sincere men are that egomaniacs?

Recently, the glittering allure of the presidency has been dirtied first by Richard M. Nixon's pervasive dishonesty and then diminished by the well-meaning, but horribly inept campaigning of Senator George McGovern.

And now this highest office is being lowered to a new nadir in prestige by its present occupant—an athletic jock—who has got to be nominated for first honors as probably one of the dumbest men ever to serve as president.

One can't blame Mondale, 46, for abandoning the presidential holy grail. And all sides of the political spectrum can admire his candid admission that "I found I did not have the overwhelming desire to be president which is essential for the kind of campaigning that is required."

Nonetheless, all of us ought to start worrying where this country is heading when the greatest political talents among us treat the nation's highest office like an abandoned house.

Hubert Humphrey, can we have a word with you?

THE MAKING OF A PRESIDENT

"(When the dinners run out, the luncheons begin, and when the luncheons run out, the breakfasts begin. We may all meet next week to get the campaign out of the red with a midnight brunch at $85 a person—and I will be there.)" JOHN F. KENNEDY, 1960.)

Walter Mondale won't be there. The Minnesota senator announced last week that while he admired those politicians who were willing to make the sacrifices presidential campaigning requires, it wasn't worth it to him. So he ended his candidacy less than one year after he began it. All who follow politics more or less with interest will certainly sympathize with Mr. Mondale's dilemma. He believes that only as President can a public official make a maximum impact on public policy. But he doesn't believe a presidential campaign is endurable. We believe that Senator Mondale would have made a good candidate. He is one of the most articulate and attractive of the Democratic party's liberals. It is too bad he found he couldn't take the grind.

The grind is a punishing one—too punishing. There ought to be some way to make it less of a mankiller. Certainly if it were shorter people like Senator Mondale would be more likely to go the route. But if it were shorter, the American public would never really get to know enough about newcomers on the scene like Mondale. That's the public's dilemma. We are stuck with the old familiar faces and the marathon runners who can campaign from breakfast through midnight brunch for two or more years. That narrows down the American choice too much.

But we don't know what to do about it. We guess John Kennedy set the pattern for a long time to come by proving that a long campaign could lead to victory. That means that in 1976 the Democratic nominee will almost surely be one of those already-known stand-bys, such as Senator Henry Jackson, Senator Hubert Humphrey or Senator Edmund Muskie, or one of those younger men eager to pick up where Walter Mondale left off, such as Senator Lloyd Bentsen of Texas or Governor Jimmy Carter of Georgia, both of whom have announced that they are planning to announce, or Representative Morris Udall of Arizona, who formally tossed his hat into the ring last week, just as Mondale was taking his back out.

WALTER MONDALE LEAVES A MESSAGE

Sen. Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota was hinting something important about the quest for the American presidency when he announced his decision not to run.

"I do not have," he said, "the overwhelming desire to be president which is essential for the kind of campaign that is required."

In that statement, it is possible to read at least two significant implications.

The first is that the burden of campaigning for the presidency has become so vast and irksome that a man with only a moderate desire for the office would be unwilling to undertake it.

The second is that the burden of campaigning tends to limit the field to those with a desire so strong that it may be unhealthy or an egotism so powerful that it may impair their judgment.

Mondale was out on the hustings in 30 states this fall to help Democratic candidates and take soundings on his own prospects for the presidential race. He spent $100,000 in the process, and his aides say he received all the encouragement he could have asked for.

But he saw at first hand the ordeal of candidates and the powerful emotional commitments that were necessary to sustain them through many of the punishing, absurd and distasteful aspects of campaigning.

Mondale did not want the presidency badly enough to endure all that it has become necessary to endure to win elections. Nor did he feel that he was the only man who could save the country and therefore had an obligation to run.

His unwillingness to compromise his identity in a campaign to gain office and his recognition that God had not necessarily chosen him to save the country may be the very qualities most desirable in a president.

But the voters will rarely have men like Mondale to choose from in presidential elections. The choices will more commonly have to be made among men with a passion for power or a messianic concept of their own roles.

Until we can introduce more sense and moderation into presidential campaigning, we will continue to lose men like Mondale. As things stand now, the kind of man who could help the country most may be the kind who would find it most distasteful to run.

TOO LONG A ROAD FOR MONDALE

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) has withdrawn from the 1976 presidential sweepstakes, explaining that he does not have "the overwhelming desire to be President, which is essential for the kind of campaign that is required."

The nation is the loser thereby: It needs all the attractive candidates it can muster in order to make the best choice possible for its leader.

But it does, as Mondale implies, take a rare kind of desire and dedication, plus a very strong stomach indeed, to go through a full-scale campaign at the national level, and those without such attributes can be torn to shreds by the ordeal. There is the physical punishment of the incessant touring, meeting, speaking, handshaking, backslapping; the frayed nerves; the loss of sleep. There is the mental strain imposed by the crescendos of succeeding state primaries. There is the critical problem of somehow raising the money to get the job done without mortgaging one's soul.

Unless the loftiness of the goal and the headiness of the effort can make up for all of this, a man is wise to stop where Mondale did before he really gets caught up.

But of course there shouldn't be such punishment involved in the process, and there needn't be if Congress will ever bestir itself to the point of providing corrective measures. It can substantially shorten the campaign period, and it can relieve the candidates of much or all of the money-raising anguish. Efforts to achieve the latter are afoot in Congress; some day the whole job may be done. Meanwhile the nation must live with the constant chance that the best men for the job just won't or can't pay the price.

A CHANGE OF MIND

In the stepping-stone atmosphere that has characterized American politics for well over a century, the path of the most determined players leads to the White House.

And in this day of instant and constant communication, the game is played virtually around the clock, rather than once every four years as was the comfortable custom of a past that is still within the memory of many citizens.

When President Ford assumed office in August, little more than two years before the next presidential election, a month of general relief for both Republicans and Democrats set in. By middle and late September, play was resumed with, on the Democratic side, the names of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) leading the rest.

President Ford found an early opportunity to declare himself a candidate in 1976, and not long after Sen. Kennedy withdrew his name from speculation, Sen. Mondale sensed a vacuum, as, perhaps, did others and geared up his campaign to make himself more widely known.

But on Thursday, Sen. Mondale, too dropped out of the field, and many a liberal Democrat felt the party had lost its "last hero," or at least the last one now visible on the stepping-stones.

The Democratic Party roster of presidential hopefuls is never exhausted, of course, but most of those whose names and faces will continue to be seen lean more toward the political center. Among them are Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen Jr. of Texas, Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia, Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, Rep. Morris Udall (D-Ariz.), and Gov. George Wallace of Alabama. Boston's Mayor Kevin White has been showing his flag for national office, and after the first of the year, new Democratic governors and members of Congress elected this month may stride into national prominence.

Politics being the equivocal profession it is, some observers sense that Sen. Mondale has chosen to stand aside while other competitors conduct their predictable internecine warfare, and to be available at the proper time.

But a human and compassionate—even firm—conviction shows through in the poignancy of his withdrawal statement: "I do not have the overwhelming desire to be President which is essential for the kind of campaign that is required." A clue might also be found in a story Sen. Mondale has told about entering a restaurant with his teenage son Theodore. "Dad," the boy said, "please don't shake hands with anybody. Let's just sit down."

It may be the party's and the nation's loss that Walter Mondale, whether through disillusion or family concern, will not be on the national stage discussing issues to the degree that a campaign would offer. The greater danger is that if too many good politicians hold back, the door will be open to a demagogue.

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIER. Mr. President, the 93d Congress is now drawing to a close and the Senate has still failed to take affirmative action on the Genocide Convention.

As I have said innumerable times on the Senate floor, ratification of the Genocide Convention is of the utmost importance to our country. The U.S. delegation took the lead in drafting the Genocide Convention because they felt secure with the principles expressed in our Declaration of Independence and Constitution and felt it was imperative for our country to take a strong stand against this abhorrent crime. Yet the Senate does not seem to feel as secure in our freedoms as our diplomatic corps.

This is a tragic anomaly that must be corrected. It is now too late for action on this human rights treaty this year but we must act early in the next Congress.

It is time for us to reassert United States leadership in the field of protection of human rights. To do anything less, Mr. President, would be a betrayal of the noble aspirations of our Founding Fathers.

COST OF COAL

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, over the last year, the Congress has been considering S. 425, the Surface Mining Reclamation Act, but now that congressional agreement and approval is at hand the Executive has indicated that he intends to veto this important measure. This is an unfortunate circumstance since extensive hearings in the Congress clearly determined that this was a necessary and workable bill. In fact, many of the President's own advisers recommend against the promised veto.

Let anyone think that the problems of strip and deep mining are trivial or that congressional action can safely be put off until next year, I ask that an article appearing in the September 1974 issue of Environment magazine by George E. Dials and Elizabeth C. Moore entitled "The Cost of Coal" be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE COST OF COAL—WE CAN AFFORD TO DO BETTER

(By George E. Dials and Elizabeth C. Moore)

Coal mining in the United States damages the environment and the health of coal miners. Unfortunately, the cost of this damage is seldom paid by those who enjoy the labor-saving energy and the profits that come from coal. Instead, most of the cost is paid by the people who live and work where the coal is mined. Their lands are gutted, and their streams and lakes are polluted. Smoke from burning refuse piles hangs over wide areas, and thousands of miners are crippled because of accidents or are coughing their lives away because of black lung disease.

Most of the damage and destruction is unnecessary, and it is less necessary every day. The technology is available to make coal mining safe for both miners and environment. The problem is that until now this technology has been largely ignored in order to avoid additional production cost—and thus to keep coal price-competitive with other sources of energy.

Such protection is no longer needed. In today's U.S. energy market, coal mining can be made safe and environmentally sound without jeopardizing coal's competitive advantage.

The following article estimates that during the years 1970-2000 human and environmental costs—what might be called social costs—will total $0.8727 per ton for deep-mined and $1.0028 per ton for surface-mined coal. No charges for damage to miners or environment prior to 1970 are included. If these costs had been added to the average selling price of coal in 1972, the price of deep-mined coal would have gone up to $10.57 per ton (an increase of 9 percent), and surface-mined coal would have cost the consumer $6.65 per ton (an increase of nearly 18 percent). With recent skyrocketing coal prices, the addition of social costs would be less in percentage terms.

The human and environmental cost figures developed in this article are estimates. They are based on past experience, which means that they are on the conservative side because inflation has made everything cost more—and there is no end in sight. Social costs will also be affected by any future changes in legislative controls, mining and reclamation technology, incidence of accidents and black lung disease, miners' wage rates—and whether the coal rush to the West continues.

The estimates do, however, give us a much better idea of what a ton of coal really costs, and hence what its market price should be. At this higher market price, coal will still be a bargain, and it will continue to be a bargain even if social costs increase substantially above the estimates that follow.

What coal mining does to people and the environment depends on which kind of mining is being discussed. In this article mining will be divided into two traditional categories: underground mining (or deep mining, as it is commonly called) and surface mining (which includes both strip and auger mining).

In both discussions, costs will be analyzed over a specific 30-year period, the years 1970-2000, and the analysis will be based consistently on the following assumptions:

1. The cumulative production of coal during the period 1970-2000 will be 20 billion tons. Although this estimate represents an extrapolation of past production history, it may well be conservative because of the escalating world demand for energy and the shortages or high prices of alternative fuels such as oil and natural gas.

2. During the 30-year period, an average of 60 percent of the coal (12 billion tons) will be surface-mined, and 40 percent (8 billion tons) will be deep-mined. As shown in Figure 1, there has been a dramatic increase in the percentage of coal that comes from surface mines in the U.S.—up from less than 2 percent in 1920 to 48.9 percent in 1972. According to L. W. Westerstrom of the Bureau of Mines, the figure for 1973 will probably be about 51 percent when data for that year are complete. With the increased amount of mining in the West, where surface mining is more prevalent, this upward trend is expected to continue.

3. There will be no significant breakthroughs in mining or reclamation technology. There will therefore be no marked increase in productivity in the coal-mining industry, and no marked change in the effectiveness of methods used to prevent or repair environmental damage.

4. There will be no restrictive legislation that will affect the type of mining practices now permitted.

History may prove that some of these assumptions are way off base. The authors hope, for example, that the third and fourth assumptions will be proved wrong, and soon. But in estimating the social costs of coal, past experience must be leaned on heavily, and that means holding some important variables—notably technology and legislation—constant during the analysis.

One important point must always be kept in mind by the reader: the social costs calculated in this article will be only those resulting from coal production during the 1970-2000 time period, and will not include any costs for damage in the past.

The costs for past damage, such as payments to present black-lung victims and the costs of reclaiming strip-mined "orphan" lands are large; many people feel that they should be paid by the current consumers of coal, since so many of them are the same people and groups who consumed the coal when the damage was done. Others argue that these compensation and reclamation costs should be paid by the federal government out of general revenues—which really means that they should be paid by all the taxpayers in the nation.

This is an important argument, and one that generates much heat. But it is beyond the scope of this article. In the analysis that follows, we shall frequently indicate the scope of these damages in the past, and past experience will be used as a basis for estimating costs during the 1970-2000 period. But we shall not confuse the two; scrupulous care has been taken to separate past from future in developing the cost figures.

The following social costs of coal will be analyzed in this article for deep-mined coal: mine fires, disposal of mine wastes, control of acid mine drainage, prevention of subsidence, loss of potential production due to accidents, black lung disease, and other costs (gaps in restitution to miners and their families after accidents, lowered property values near mine sites, damage to roads and highways). Analyzed for surface-mined coal will be: land reclamation, control of acid mine drainage, sedimentation, diminished recreational value of land, loss of potential production due to accidents, and other costs (same as those for deep-mined coal).

DEEP MINING: MINE FIRES

There are two types of fires that occur during deep mining: underground mine fires and fires in coal refuse piles. Both are damaging and expensive to control. In the 1971 Senate subcommittee hearings on surface mining, John Quarles, then general counsel of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), reported that, taken together, the two kinds of fires had caused the deaths of 50 people and the destruction of property valued at more than $2 billion.

Today, however, coal operators use effective techniques to prevent fires in deep mines and refuse banks—and the money spent on fire prevention is routinely included in production costs, and hence in the selling price of coal. Mandated by the Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, use of these techniques means that new outbreaks are expected to be relatively rare in the future. For this reason, assessment of the social costs of coal mined from 1970-2000 includes no charge for control of mine fires.

DISPOSAL OF MINE WASTES

Some mine waste in deep mining comes from the mine itself, and some of it is a discarded by-product of the coal preparation process. Most of this waste is simply put into piles, creating a real environmental problem. Mine refuse piles are unsightly; they discharge particulates and noxious gases; they result in acid drainage and sedimentation; and they are subject to massive slides.

The magnitude and cost of these wastes are enormous. Bureau of Mines studies in Kentucky and Alabama show that one-quarter of a ton of waste is produced for each ton of coal mined, and that disposal of these wastes costs an average of $0.07 per ton of coal mined. At this rate, the 8 billion tons of deep-mined coal projected for the period 1970-2000 will result in 2 billion tons of waste, and disposal of the waste would cost $1.4 million.

An intensive search is underway to find constructive and profitable ways to use these mine wastes—in the manufacture of lightweight aggregates for concrete or cinder blocks, as a fill for flat coastal areas, in the manufacture of bricks, in the construction of secondary roads in the form of burned refuse, and in generation of electricity. In mining areas, these wastes are sometimes used to backfill both active and abandoned underground mines.

The happy day when mine waste can be turned into profit cannot come too soon, but until it does, it seems reasonable to use the $0.07-per-ton figure from the Bureau of Mines studies as the average cost of mine waste disposal.

ACID MINE DRAINAGE

The acid water which drains from both deep and surface mines is justly infamous. Frequently orange-red in color, it kills the aquatic life in streams and makes the water unfit for human consumption.

The total amount of drainage each year is tremendous. It is estimated that back in 1966, when coal production was considerably less than it is now, mining operations in the Appalachian region alone discharged 4 million tons (nearly 1 billion gallons) of acid each year into 5,700 miles of streams, resulting in continuous and serious deterioration of water quality. In the U.S. as a whole, nearly 11,000 miles of streams are affected by acid mine drainage on either a continuous or intermittent basis.

The effects of acid mine drainage are expensive. It has been estimated that it adds about $3.5 million each year to the costs of industrial water users, municipal water suppliers, navigation, and public facilities.

There are a number of methods that can be used to control acid mine drainage, such as neutralization, distillation, reverse osmosis, ion exchange, and so on. Some of them involve treating the water to make it nonacid, and others reduce the amount of drainage that takes place at the mine.

Which methods are used depends on many variables—the type of mine (surface, underground below drainage level, or underground above drainage level), whether it is active or inactive, and what the geological and hydrological conditions are.

What will be the cost of acid mine drainage caused by the deep mining of 8 billion tons of coal between 1970 and 2000, and how much would this cost be on the average for each ton of coal mined? (Costs of acid mine drainage in surface mining are discussed later.)

The answer does not seem to lie in a detailed analysis of specific control methods.

There are too many different methods, and the differences in costs and effectiveness are too great to allow us to calculate averages on any sensible basis. Instead we will take a look at our past national experience with this problem, and then use that information to estimate the future.

In 1970, the Department of the Interior estimated that it would cost $6.6 billion to clean up all the acid mine drainage in the nation—that is, to treat all the acid water so that it would be usable and nontoxic. This $6.6 billion figure deals with past damage; it represents the total result of all the coal mining done in the U.S. from the beginning of our history up to the year 1970. It can also be used as a basis for estimating what the future costs of acid mine drainage will be.

But before using the $6.6 billion figure for this purpose, we must recognize that it includes the cost of not only the acid mine drainage that originated in the mines themselves (both deep and surface), but also of the acid mine drainage that originated in refuse or waste piles—from rainwater leaching down through the piles and turning acid in the process. Remember that we have just discussed the importance of disposing of mine wastes—and have developed a figure ($0.07 per ton of coal) for the cost of doing so. In our calculations of the per-ton cost of acid mine drainage, therefore, we must ignore—indeed, we must be careful to eliminate—any costs that are the result of acid mine drainage from waste or refuse piles. Otherwise we will be double charging, and our cost figures will be accordingly inflated.

So the first step is to estimate how much of the $6.6 billion cleanup cost should be subtracted for this reason. There are no precise figures available, but David Maneval of the Appalachian Regional Commission estimates that somewhere between 10 and 15 percent of the pre-1970 acid mine drainage originated in waste piles. Using a midpoint estimate of 12.5 percent and subtracting it from the total cost, it would cost $5.78 billion to clean up the acid mine drainage coming from mines.

Of this $5.78 billion worth of drainage, over 70 percent, or about $4.05 billion, originated in deep mines, which produced a total of 69 billion tons of coal during that period of time. The cost therefore averages out of $0.0587 per ton. In other words, if all the acid mine drainage produced by deep mines up to 1970 were cleaned up, it would cost an average of $0.0587 for each ton of deep-mined coal produced during that long period.

Recent experience indicates that $0.0587 per ton is a very conservative figure. On the basis of experience in treating acid mine water at four typical bituminous deep mines in Pennsylvania, Maneval has estimated that the average cost of treatment was $0.20 per ton of coal mined.

So although we do not include the costs of past damage in calculating the real cost of coal during the period 1970–2000, we can use past experience as a basis of estimating what future costs will be. In this case, we conservatively estimate that it will cost an average of $0.0587 per ton to clean up the acid mine drainage caused by deep mining 8 billion tons of coal during the last 30 years of the twentieth century. The total cost of abatement would be $470 million.

PREVENTION OF SUBSIDENCE

Mine subsidence occurs when a mine caves in, causing the land above it to buckle and settle. It can cause extensive and expensive property damage, particularly in urban areas—as citizens of Scranton and Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania can testify.

Most subsidence can be traced directly to the type of mining techniques used. In the room-and-pillar technique, which has been popular in the U.S., the columns or pillars of coal that are left in place to furnish support represent lost production—coal that cannot be sold. So the pillars are often of only intermediate size and strength, and the unsupported sections of the mine frequently subside. It is this nonuniform subsidence that causes the most damage on the surface.

New mining techniques, particularly the longwall method brought to the U.S. from Germany during the last decade, can help alleviate this problem. A special machine, known as a longwall miner, removes all of the coal as the machine advances through the seam; a set of automatic advancing jacks holds up the mine roof immediately behind and parallel with the cutting bits. As the operation moves farther along the coal deposit, the jacks are also moved, leaving behind a completely mined-out area. The surface over this area settles, but because 100 percent of the coal has been removed, the settling or subsidence is uniform—and hence not usually damaging to surface structures. Until the longwall method is more widely used in the U.S., however, the threat of subsidence remains a real problem. At the Senate hearings in late 1971, the EPA's John Quarles estimated that there was a threat of subsidence or cave-ins in more than 250 communities in 28 states.

When coal is mined with the room-and-pillar technique, the most common method used to prevent subsidence is to backfill the abandoned mine—that is, to fill up the voids with some strong, solid substance that will prevent buckling of the surface. At the same 1971 Senate hearings, Assistant Secretary of the Interior Hollis M. Dole estimated the cost of backfilling abandoned mines at $10,000 to $15,000 per undermined acre. He based his estimate on Bureau of Mines experience in subsidence control projects conducted in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania under the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965.

The next question, then, is how many acres will have to be backfilled. According to calculations by Harry Perry, approximately 0.0001 of an acre of land was undermined in the U.S. for each ton of coal extracted from deep mines from the beginning of mining through the year 1969. This means that 800,000 acres of land will be undermined to produce the 8 billion tons of coal projected to be deep-mined during the period 1970–2000.

However, not all of the undermined acres will require backfilling to prevent subsidence. Perry estimates that of the acres undermined up to 1969, about one-third have subsided. It is difficult to predict just which areas will be in jeopardy, but David Maneval reports that research now being funded by the Appalachian Regional Commission deals with this problem, and that by 1975 a thorough and reliable method of measuring subsidence-proneness should be available.

With this tool at hand, then, we can assume that of the 800,000 acres undermined between 1970 and 2000, only about 267,000 will subside if they are not taken care of—and that these areas can be spotted ahead of time and backfilled at a cost of $15,000 per acre. The total cost of backfilling will be approximately $4 billion, or about $0.50 per ton of deep-mined coal.

DEEP-MINING ACCIDENTS

Measuring the cost of damage to human beings—the cost of accidents—is far more complex than measuring costs to the environment, and it may in some ways be almost impossible. Who can put a price tag on pain, or a wife's worry, or the way a child feels when his father is killed in a mine explosion? Can anybody pretend that any sum of money will really make up for what it means to go through life minus an arm, or paralyzed from the waist down?

Granting all this, however, part of the social cost of an accident can be given a price tag. When a man in the prime of life is cut down by a mine cave-in, society is poorer in many ways that can be expressed in dollars and cents.

Three types of accident costs—the costs of administration, prevention, and restitution—are already being paid by the mine operators, and are then passed on to the people who buy and use coal.

Accidents create certain administrative costs. The accident must be investigated, if production levels are to be maintained, substitute workers must be recruited and trained, and their wages must be paid. Productivity probably sags, for a while at least, since substitute workers are not usually as efficient and productive as the men who were injured or killed in the accidents. These costs are paid by coal operators, and hence by coal consumers.

In order to prevent accidents, and to meet standards set under the 1969 Mine Health and Safety Act, operators install and operate mine-safety equipment, and many operators also organize and operate programs in mine-safety education. These expenses are part of the cost of mining coal and are passed on to those who buy and use it.

In the case of coal-mining accidents (as well as accidents in other industries), restitution is accomplished primarily through benefits provided by workmen's compensation programs in all 50 states of the union. These benefits include: burial allowances and survivors' benefits to widows and dependent children of miners killed at work; weekly income-replacement payments to a miner and his family during the period when he is unable to work because of a disabling accident; medical benefits to help cover doctor bills and hospital expenses; and the cost of rehabilitation programs, including those which retrain injured miners to prepare them for new jobs.

The cost of workmen's compensation programs in the coal industry is paid by the coal operators, usually in the form of insurance premiums paid either to a special state workmen's compensation fund or to private insurance companies that furnish this kind of coverage. (In some states, coal operators may qualify as self-insurers, and large coal companies sometimes choose this approach.) In any case, directly or indirectly, it is the coal operators who pay the cost of workmen's compensation programs for their employees, and the operators in turn pass on the cost to coal consumers.

There are, however, significant gaps in the coverage provided by workmen's compensation. Each state has its own program, and there are sizable variations in the amount of coverage provided. Of the 24 coal-mining states, for example, 16 pay all medical bills for injured miners—but Wyoming, at the other end of the spectrum, pays only a maximum $880. Income-replacement benefits paid to a totally disabled miner and his family are $175 a week in Alaska and $150 a week in Arizona—but in eight of the coal states the maximum payment is below the poverty level set by the U.S. Department of Labor in 1973 ($82.69 a week for a family of four). Even the most generous state programs have limits on the dollar amount of weekly benefits that will be paid to injured miners or their widows and families.

Other types of financial help are available in case of mining accidents. Depending on the duration of the disability and the age and number of dependents, some miners and/or their wives and families, are eligible for Social Security, union benefits, or both, in case of accidental injury or death. Even so, the restitution for coal-mining accidents is not usually complete. James O'Brien, assistant director of AFL-CIO's Department of Social Security, puts it this way:

"However all the various payments are put together—workmen's compensation, Social Security, union payments—the combination usually does not replace the income lost, and it frequently does not pay all of the special expenses, such as burial or medical expenses, that are incurred as a result of the accident."

Family, friends, or organized charity, public or private, must pitch in and help—and the dollar value of this needed help is a social cost of coal that must not be ignored. It is, however, a cost which at present cannot be translated into a dollars-and-cents figure for the coal industry as a whole. We know it is there, but we do not know how big it is. As long as the present situation continues, this part of the cost of coal is an inequity to those who must pay it.

To summarize, many of the costs of accidents—the costs of administration and prevention and some (though by no means all) of the costs of restitution—are paid by the coal operators, and are therefore already included in the price the consumer pays for coal.

There is, however, still another kind of cost which is incurred when a coal miner is injured or killed in an accident—and this cost is levied, not on the miner or his family or the coal operators or the coal consumers, but on the U.S. economy as a whole. When a person of working age is killed in an accident, the national economy is poorer because it loses whatever that worker could have produced during the rest of his or her working life (or during the period of disability, in case of injury). We have all seen magazine articles and health insurance ads that estimate the annual cost to the U.S. of heart disease, cancer, or alcoholism. In these articles, the costs are usually measured in terms of what happens to the productivity of working-age people who are disabled or killed by the disease in question, and these cost estimates are frequently—and successfully—used to justify spending large sums of money to help prevent, detect, and treat the illness. The same reasoning is valid in reckoning the cost of industrial accidents, including those that happen to coal miners. Our supply of manpower is one of our greatest national assets, and anything which diminishes or damages that supply levies a real cost on the nation.

This concept is easy to grasp when studying full-employment industries—including today's coal industry, in which current shortages of skilled manpower frequently mean that an injured or killed miner cannot be replaced except by hiring someone from another mining operation. In these cases, a mining accident has immediate and clear results: the loss of coal desperately needed in our energy-short economy. In industries where there is a pool of unemployed workers, an accident does not cause this immediate loss of current production—but the loss in potential production is just as real, and its results are just as serious for the long-run health of the U.S. economy.

One analyst, estimating the economic value of a human life lost in an airplane crash, included not only what the man (or woman) would have earned during the remainder of his working life, but also the value of the time he would have contributed to community service had he lived. Some economists feel that the loss of a person's contribution to family life is also an important cost of a fatal accident, and should be assigned a dollar figure.

In estimating the loss in potential production due to coal-mining accidents during the period 1970–2000, the authors have chosen to include only the amount of wages that would have been earned by dead and injured coal miners if no mining accidents had taken place. We have not included estimates of the value of a miner's services to his family and community. The result is a very conservative estimate of what our nation will lose in potential production as a result of coal-mining accidents during the last 30 years of the century.

The costs that are developed should be levied on the consumers of coal—and the money should promptly be spent by public agencies to cut down the accident rate in coal mines. There is much research that needs to be done on the causes and prevention of accidents, including the design of better ways of selecting miners, better ways of training them to do the job, and better equipment with which to do the job. Such research, including demonstration projects in different kinds of mines throughout the nation, could be a boon to miners and operators alike—and it could, if it is effective, soon lower this type of cost to the coal consumer. This is, in short, a cost which will eliminate itself if the funds are wisely spent.

CALCULATING LOSS OF EARNINGS

The next question immediately arises: How does one calculate the earnings that are lost as the result of accidents in the coal mines—and then convert this figure to a cost per ton of coal?

First, it should be noted that in making the cost calculations we have been forced to generalize. In real life, each mining accident is different, and the earnings that are lost will depend on the age of the miner, exactly what happened to him, what kind of work he does, how much he is paid—or how long he would have lived if the fatal accident had not occurred. But since data are not available on all these variables, we must be satisfied with averages.

Second, in this analysis we do recognize that a mining accident can mean anything from a slight cut requiring just a bandage to an explosion or cave-in that causes death. In this discussion we shall exclude completely what are called nondisabling accidents—those in which the employee loses less than one day of work—because no detailed information is available on them. All other mining accidents will be divided into two major categories—nonfatal disabling and fatal—and separate costs will be calculated for each.

The method used here to develop per-ton figures is essentially a straight-forward one that can be represented by the following fraction:

(1) x (2) x (3) over 8 billion tons=per-ton cost of accidents in deep coal mines.

where (1) is the total number of accidents, 1970–2000; (2) is the average number of workdays lost per accident; and (3) is the average daily earnings of coal miners; and 8 billion tons is the amount of coal that is projected to be deep-mined during 1970–2000.

As the reader follows the step-by-step computations that follow, first for nonfatal disabling accidents and then for fatal accidents, it may be helpful to refer back to this fraction occasionally to see exactly what is being done and why.

LOSS OF EARNINGS DUE TO NONFATAL DISABLING ACCIDENTS

Item (1). What is the number of nonfatal disabling accidents that can be expected to take place in deep mines in the period 1970–2000? The latest complete accident data available from the Bureau of Mines are for the year 1971, when there were 52.81 nonfatal disabling accidents per one million man-hours in underground mines.

Since the 52.81 rate is quoted for one million man-hours, the next step is to find out how many man-hours will be required to mine the 8 billion tons of deep-mined coal. According to Bureau of Mines statistics for 1971, the average productivity in underground mining was about 1.5 tons per man-hour; at that rate it would take 5.333 billion (or 5,333 million) man-hours to mine the 8 billion tons.

We can now complete the calculations:

5,333 million man-hours times 52.81 accidents per million man-hours equals 281,636 nonfatal disabling accidents in deep mines during the period 1970–2000. For ease in subsequent calculations, this number will be rounded to 281,500. Thus, item (1) in the fraction is 281,500.

Item (2). What is the average number of days lost from work per accident? According to the latest (1970) figures available from the Mining Enforcement and Safety Administration (MESA), formerly a part of the Bureau of Mines, an average of 52 days was lost or charged for each nonfatal disabling accident in the mining industry.

The "lost or charged" terminology used by MESA has important meaning, since the term "nonfatal injuries" covers a lot of territory, ranging all the way from a bruised leg (which would be what is called a temporary disability, and would be charged for the actual number of days off from work) through the loss of the first joint of a toe (a permanent partial disability that is charged at 35 days) to the loss of both legs (a permanent total disability charged at 6,000 days). (Some fifty to sixty assigned time charges were developed by the American National Standards Committee Z16 to measure the comparative severity of various kinds of industrial injuries. This committee is made up of representatives from industrial associations, and departments of state and federal governments. The time charges that were developed were based on the committee's combined experience with industrial accidents of all kinds.)

Because there is such a range of severity in nonfatal accidents, a weighted average of 52 days was derived. Thus, the average number of days lost or charged as a result of nonfatal accidents—is 52.

Item (3). What are the average daily earnings in the coal-mining industry? Preliminary Bureau of Labor Statistics data indicate that as of June 1973 the average gross earnings of miners in the coal industry were $232.93 per week, or $46.59 per day on the basis of a five-day week. (The average work week on that date was 41.3 hours, or an average of 8.26 hours per day on a five-day-week basis.) For ease in calculation, the average earnings figure has been rounded to $47 per day. Thus, item (3) in the fraction is $47.

If the total cost of $688,000,000 is divided by the 8 billion tons of coal projected to be deep-mined during the period, we find that the average loss of earnings due to nonfatal disabling accidents in deep mines would be $0.086 per ton of coal mined (at 1973 wage rates). This estimate of lost earnings can be used as a measure of the loss of potential production caused by such accidents.

LOSS OF EARNINGS DUE TO FATAL ACCIDENTS

Using the same formula, the per-ton loss of earnings as a result of fatal accidents in underground mines can be calculated as follows.

Item (1). Number of fatal accidents predicted for deep mines between 1970 and 2000. Bureau of Mines figures for 1971 show that during that year there were 0.84 fatal accidents per million man-hours, an improvement over the 1970 figure of 1.20. Since mining 8 billion tons of coal will require 5,333 million man-hours, the projected number of fatal accidents during the 30-year period would be 5,333 times 0.84 or 4,480.

Item (2). Average number of days lost or charged per fatal accident. According to MESA, a fatal accident is charged as 6,000 days. (This figure was also developed by American National Standards Committee Z16, described above.)

Item (3). Average daily earnings in the coal-mining industry are $47 per day, as described earlier.

The calculation can therefore be made as shown in the box below.

If this total cost of $1,263,360,000 is divided by the 8 billion tons of coal projected to be deep-mined during the 1970-2000 period, we find that the average loss of earnings due to fatal accidents in deep mines would be $0.158 per ton of coal mined (at 1973 wage rates). This loss of earnings can be used to measure the loss of potential production due to fatal accidents.

The combined loss of potential production (as measured by lost earnings) in deep mines during the 1970-2000 period is as follows:

Due to nonfatal disabling accidents, $0.086 per ton.

Due to fatal accidents, $0.158 per ton.

Total loss of potential production due to accidents in deep mines, $0.244 per ton.

FURTHER DEEP-MINING COSTS

As of May 1973, black lung payments to miners and their widows had cost $1 billion, and were expected to top $8 billion by 1980. These are costs, however, that are the result of the way deep mining was done in the past. Presumably the future is going to be different—and better. Federal standards under the 1969 Mine Health and Safety Law required that by the end of 1972 the level of respirable dust could not exceed 2 milligrams per cubic meter of air; the Bureau of Mines reported in the summer of 1973 that coal dust had been reduced to acceptable levels in 93 percent of the mines in the nation.

The standards in the 1969 law were set after consultation with experts, and presumably they are rigorous enough to ensure that new miners coming into the industry will not contract the disease. If these standards are rigorous enough, and if they are enforced, the social cost of coal deep-mined during the last 30 years of the twentieth century will not include any costs attributable to black lung. If the standards are not rigorous or not enforced, it will be quite another story.

In this analysis we will assume the best, and therefore not include in the cost table a charge for black lung disease. But this is one entry that merits the closest scrutiny as more experience and data are accumulated on miners' health under the new law.

We have already discussed one of the costs of coal that is very real but which cannot be translated into national dollar figures: the gaps in restitution (medical and income benefits) to miners and their families after accidents. These gaps exist in both deep mining and surface mining.

There are other costs that fall in this same unquantifiable category: the lowered property values near mine sites (because of noise, dust, and general unsightliness) and the damage to roads and highways caused by heavy equipment and coal trucks. These latter two social costs are usually greater in surface mining than in deep mining, but they exist in both.

The estimated social costs of deep-mined coal add up to $0.873 per ton, or a total of $6.982 billion for the 8 billion tons projected to be deep-mined during the period 1970-2000.

SURFACE MINING: LAND RECLAMATION

Without proper reclamation, thousands of square miles of surface-mined "moonscape" will be left as a legacy to future generations; large portions of some Appalachian states already have this appearance. Thanks to the work of many fine photographers, we all now know what surface mining does to the land, and most people in the U.S. would agree without hesitation that if there is going to be surface mining there should also be good reclamation afterward. There is great disagreement, however, as to what "good reclamation" means and how much it costs.

In 1971, Assistant Secretary of the Interior Hollis Dole estimated that it would cost an average of $600 per acre for what he called "basic reclamation" (grading, revegetation, and drainage control) of the approximately 2.3 million acres of unrestored surface-mined land that existed in 1970. In the same testimony, he pointed out that Bureau of Mines data on reclamation work in the Appalachian states showed an average cost of $1,100 per acre to return surface-mined land to productive use, with some special projects running as high as $15,000 per acre.

In 1971, William Guckert, director of the Mine Reclamation Division in Pennsylvania's Bureau of Land Protection and Reclamation, reported that the cost of reclamation performed by mine operators in Pennsylvania averaged from $250-$500 per acre, with some costs of $750 per acre in high terrain.

In a U.S. Bureau of Mines project in Pennsylvania in 1966, the cost of grading and filling a strip-mined area ranged from $912 to $2,770 per acre, depending on the methods used. According to estimates by the Center for Science in the Public Interest, reforestation or planting of forage for grazing could add another $250 per acre.

In its 1972 calculation of the total cost of cleaning up our national environment, the Council on Environmental Quality used a figure of $2,000 per acre as the average cost of reclaimed land disturbed by surface mining.

Ernest Preate, president of Help Eliminate Life's Pollutants (H.E.L.P.), a citizen conservation group in Scranton, Pennsylvania, reported costs of $2,000 an acre (for backfilling, grading, and landscaping 120 acres of surface-mined land near Scranton), $5,730 an acre (for rough grading, compacting, and controlled filling of a 20-acre tract to be used as the site of a vocational-technical school in Lackawanna County, Pennsylvania), and $8,000 an acre (for site preparation work on 27.4 acres of surface-mined land in Norton, Virginia, which were used as the location of an elementary school).

The Soil Conservation Service reports costs of $2,000 an acre for reclamation work performed by an independent mine operator near Catoosa, Oklahoma, where the land is as flat as a tabletop.

The Environmental Protection Agency reports that the per-acre cost of regrading and revegetating surface-mined land includes the following: $500 to $2,500 per acre for regrading, $50 for fertilizer, $60 for liming to reduce soil acidity, and $200 to $800 for seeding. No costs were estimated for stockpiling topsoil, for surface preparation (raking, reburial of toxic and dark-colored materials, and breaking up compacted surfaces) or for irrigating dry areas, but these costs would be high in many mining operations.

Cost of reclamation is obviously a slippery statistic. It not only depends on all the obvious variables—the topography, the soil, and the geology of the area affected, the depth of the pit, or the size of the cut, it also depends on what standards must be met. Does "good reclamation" mean just restoring the land to useful condition—any use at all? Is it enough, for example, to restore former cropland to a condition such that it is suitable only for pasture? And what attention do we pay to the aesthetics of the situation? Some of the mountains of Appalachia, for example, had no specific economic use before they were surface-mined—but they were an important part of the scenery, and many people enjoyed them.

In calculating the social costs of coal, the standards of acceptable reclamation are beyond dispute: after reclamation is complete, the surface-mined land must be at least as economically productive and attractive to the eye as it was before mining began.

On this basis, of course, there is some land that should never be surface-mined at all, since it can never be fully restored, no matter how much money is spent. That is why several of the surface-mining bills that have been proposed in Congress have prohibited surface mining in steep-slope areas, such as those common in Central Appalachia. In the western part of the U.S., where the coal seams are often very thick, there are other problems. "If you remove a 30-foot thickness of earth," says David Maneval, "surface mine a 100-foot-thick seam of coal, and then just put the earth back, as is frequently done in parts of the West, you finish up with an enormous hole." This is not acceptable reclamation by any standard.

The authors hope that federal legislation will soon prohibit surface mining in areas where good reclamation is impossible. If this happens, the average per-acre cost of reclamation in the U.S. will go down. As of now, however, the average must include what it costs to do everything possible to restore these lands, even though the final results will not be satisfactory. Difficulty must not be used as an excuse for doing nothing.

On this basis, then, how do we decide which reclamation cost figure to use? The U.S. averages that are generally available are not satisfactory. They are based heavily on experience in Pennsylvania, where most of the surface-mined land is flat or rolling and rainfall is adequate—two great advantages in reclamation work. Perhaps even more important, the quality of reclamation varies widely from one part of the U.S. to another. Since there has to date been no quality control on a national level, averaging out reclamation costs in the U.S. today is almost a meaningless exercise.

So in developing an average per-acre reclamation cost for this article, we have chosen to go another route: to find a place where large-scale reclamation work has been done over a long period of time, where the caliber of the work has been high enough to return surface-mined land to truly productive use—and then to find out how much that kind of reclamation costs.

GERMANY'S EXAMPLE

The place is West Germany, where fuel needs were and are such that "it is not possible to consider seriously the luxury of banning the surface mining of brown coal. Instead, methods of mining and land restoration had to be developed which would permit continued production of brown coal without incurring serious environmental damage."

German reclamation in the brown-coal fields of the Rhineland begins before the mining starts. Detailed plans are made for the evacuation and relocation of populated settlements and for the restoration of land after the mining is over. Land-use patterns are proposed and approved far in advance, and the post-mining landscape is planned accordingly. With this kind of advance planning, the mining operations can be tailored to fit the land restoration work that is to follow—instead of vice versa, as is so often the case in the U.S. During the mining, huge wheel excavators selectively strip off and save the top layer of loess, a form of topsoil—the extremely fertile loam which lies at the surface. The remaining sand, gravel, and clay overburden is then removed, and the coal is extracted. After mining is completed, mammoth spreaders are used to fill the overburden back into the mined-out pits, which are then leveled off with bulldozers. The loess, which has been combined with water to make a slurry, is then reapplied to the surface. The slurry dries out after several months, leaving behind a three- to six-foot-thick layer of fertile topsoil on which almost anything can grow. Grain and hay, for example, thrive on land restored less than five years earlier.

The institutional arrangements used by the Germans for planning, regulating, and enforcing this program are of particular interest, and although there is not enough space to discuss them here, we strongly recommend that they be studied by any person or group interested in reducing the environmental damage we now suffer from surface mining.

The German program has been operating slightly more than twenty years. Under its aegis, 33,000 acres of land have already been restored for forestry, agriculture, and recreational uses. Officials there report that the costs of restoring mined-out lands to full agricultural productivity range from $3,000 to $4,500 per acre.

Experience in Great Britain, where strip-mining regulations are very strict and reclamation is first-rate, bears out the German cost figures. A Sierra Club study shows that British costs ranged between $1,350 and $7,542, for a rough average of about $4,400 per acre—clearly in the same range as the West German costs.

On the basis of this German and British experience, therefore, a reclamation cost of $4,000 per acre will be used in this analysis. Of course there are differences between the work done in Europe and that carried out in the U.S. Few U.S. reclamation projects, for example, would involve transplanting whole towns, as was sometimes the case in West Germany; so in this regard the American work might be done more cheaply. On the other hand, however, a great deal of surface mining in the U.S. takes place in mountainous areas, where reclamation is far more expensive than in either Germany or Britain; strip-mining in those countries is permitted only on relatively flat terrain.

On balance, the $4,000-per-acre figure—assuming that we insist on first-class reclamation of our surface-mined lands—if we try to do it for less, we will get just what we pay for: lands that are far less productive and frequently far less beautiful than they were before mining took place.

PER-TON COST OF RECLAMATION

To calculate the total cost of reclamation, we must know not only the cost per acre, but how many acres will be affected. The Bureau of Mines has estimated that the average thickness of bituminous and lignite coal seams surface-mined in 1970 was 5.7 feet; no corresponding figure is available for anthracite. If the average density of surface-mined coal is 1,800 tons per acre-foot, this means that the coal content of surface-mined seams would average 10,260 tons per acre (1,800 tons per acre-foot times 5.7 feet). With an 80 percent recovery factor (about 20 percent of the coal in a seam is lost or wasted in the mining process), the actual yield would average 8,200 tons of coal per acre.

This means that approximately 1.5 million acres will have to be stripped to obtain the 12 billion tons of surface-mined coal projected for the 1970-2000 period. Using the reclamation cost of $4,000 per acre, the total cost of reclamation will be $6.0 billion, or $0.50 per ton.

How will this per-ton cost estimate be affected by today's coal rush to the American West, where thick seams of low-sulfur coal (frequently yielding from 40,000 to 80,000 tons per acre) lie relatively close to the surface? It is too soon to know what the per-ton cost of reclamation will be in these surface-mining operations. In a recently published report by the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) to the Energy Policy Project of the Ford Foundation, a panel of scientists flashed some warning signals. The major findings of the report were summarized in a magazine article by Thad W. Box of Utah State University, chairman of the study committee:

"In the western coal areas, restoration [which the panel defines as duplicating the pre-mining conditions of the site] is rarely, if ever, possible. Rehabilitation, however, should be performed for all stages of mining."

Note that the definition of "rehabilitation" used by the panel contains some rather elastic terms, as indicated by authors' italics:

"'Rehabilitation' as used in this report implies that the land will be returned to a form and productivity in conformity with a prior land use plan including a stable ecological state that does not contribute substantially to environmental deterioration and is consistent with surrounding aesthetic values."

Even if one accepts this "rehabilitation" as an appropriate standard, there is no guarantee of success. "Those areas receiving ten inches or more of annual rainfall can usually be rehabilitated," writes Professor Box, "provided that evapo-transpiration is not excessive, if the landscapes are properly shaped and if techniques that have been demonstrated successful in rehabilitating disturbed rangeland are applied. . . . The drier areas, those receiving less than ten inches of annual rainfall or with high evapo-transpiration rates, pose a more difficult problem. . . . Where natural revegetation of a disturbed site may occur in five to twenty years on a high-rainfall eastern U.S. site, it may take decades or even centuries for natural revegetation to occur in a desert. . . . Arid ecosystems are delicately balanced and, once disturbed, may never reach natural equilibrium on a time scale acceptable to modern man. . . . Revegetation of these [arid] areas probably can be accomplished only with major, sustained inputs of water, fertilizer, and management."

But this is not the whole story. "Rehabilitation of mined lands requires more than achieving a stable growth of plants," Professor Box continues. "In these other aspects—wildlife, aesthetics, erosion control and water quality—pertinent data for rehabilitating mined land are virtually nonexistent. The necessary research has barely begun. . . . In the West the absence of a climatic 'safety factor' means that even supplying all the requirements will not guarantee success. Instead, successful rehabilitation requires a commitment to the proper application of proven techniques at all the critical times."

In short, even the somewhat fuzzy goal of "rehabilitation" is not going to be easy to attain in the West, and its cost and success are still uncertain.

There is still a third standard defined in the NAS report: "reclamation," which is something less than complete restoration but something more than mere rehabilitation. It is defined as "making the site habitable to organisms that were originally present, or others that approximate the original inhabitants," a standard of acceptability very similar to that used by the authors of this article. If we insist on this standard for surface-mined land in the West, cost and success are even greater question marks—and we need to start finding the answers before we heedlessly allow any more of the landscape to be damaged by strip-mining.

CONTROL OF ACID MINE DAMAGE

In surface mining, most of the acid mine drainage originates in the spoil banks—the piles of dirt, rock, and shale which are stripped from the surface to get at the coal underneath. These spoil banks are potent generators of acid for a number of reasons:

(1) In surface mining there is great exposure of the layers of shale, which are heavy producers of sulfuric acid when they are exposed to air and water. Since these shale layers are usually found directly above and below the coal seam, they are customarily the last to be stripped off, and hence they usually finish up at the top of the spoil pile, where they can do the greatest damage.

(2) Even if the shale is not at the top of the pile, spoil banks encourage formation of acid mine drainage because the loose material in them allows both air and water to percolate down ten feet or more.

(3) Higher temperatures produce more acid water, and during the summer months the temperature in spoil piles is very high.

(4) It is hard to control the acid produced by surface mines because the acid water from spoil banks can flow in all directions, down off and down through the spoil.

In 1970 the total cost of treating all the then-existing acid mine drainage was estimated by the Department of the Interior to be $6.6 billion, of which $5.78 billion was attributed to the mines themselves, as calculated earlier in this article. Of this cost, 30 percent, or about $1.73 billion, was due to surface mining. From the beginning of coal mining until 1970, 4.4 billion tons of coal had been surface-mined. The average cost of abating acid drainage would therefore be $1.73 billion divided by 4.4 billion tons, or $0.3932 for each ton of coal surface-mined during that long period.

If proper land reclamation is carried out, as we have already discussed in this article, will the amount of acid mine drainage in surface mining be reduced to zero? The answer to this question depends on the kind of reclamation being talked about. The work done in West Germany did not include any special provisions for preventing acid mine drainage since there are no sulfur-bearing minerals in the brown-coal fields of the Rhineland. In areas where the sulfur-bearing shale layers do exist, the problem is unavoidable. In the words of David Maneval:

"In strip mining, the union between coal, air, and water is almost inevitable. Coal seams are exposed to the air during stripping operations, and rainfall furnishes the water, which frequently runs down the hillside into the area where the stripping is going on."

Special actions are therefore required to prevent formation of acid mine drainage. First, the sulfur-bearing strata must be segregated, and this requires great care since they are usually the layers which lie nearest the coal seams. Then this sulfur-bearing material must be put at the bottom of the strip pit, and the top layers of the piles must be compacted tightly. Simultaneously, all water must be diverted from the mining operations, and if any water accumulates in the pit as the result of direct rainfall, it must be pumped out and treated immediately.

In short, reclamation must include some very specific practices if it is to prevent acid mine drainage altogether, and most of these practices were not included in the German work because the problem did not exist there.

There is no question, however, that even without these specific practices, the amount of acid mine drainage will be cut down markedly by what is called basic reclamation work—putting the spoil back after mining is completed, restoring the topsoil, and revegetating the area. So if any kind of decent reclamation work is done, the cost of controlling acid mine drainage will be considerably less than the $0.393 per ton estimated cost for past mining—precisely how much less is not known at present.

For these reasons, $0.393 a ton will be the maximum cost of acid mine drainage for surface-mined coal, and the cost figure will be so labeled in Table 3.

CONTROL OF SEDIMENTATION

Another major water pollution problem that results from strip-mining is sedimentation. Strip-mined areas continuously erode, filling streams and rivers with sediment which impedes the flow of water, fills the stream channels and promotes flooding, coats stream bottoms and prevents the growth of aquatic plant and animal life, fills reservoirs and impoundments, clogs public water systems and transmits pathogenic organisms. According to studies by the U.S. Geological Survey, erosion and sedimentation rates on strip-mined land are 500 times as great as those on neighboring land that has not been stripped.

Furthermore, erosion also loads water with large quantities of other minerals, such as manganese, aluminum, ammonium, magnesium, calcium, potassium, and sodium. These minerals are needed in the stripped soil to encourage revegetation; without them the soil is not hospitable to new growth. Maybe even worse, when the minerals collect in runoff water in toxic concentrations, they destroy fish and plant life wherever these waters flow.

Unfortunately there have been no specific and detailed analyses of what it costs to correct this particular impact of surface mining. Removing sediment from streams—or preventing it from going there in the first place—have been viewed as integral parts of land reclamation, and it has been assumed that the cost of reclamation covers the cost of coping with sedimentation as well.

This is probably a safe assumption if the reclamation is really first-rate. If it is not then specific actions must be taken to prevent erosion and remove sediment from mine water, and those actions cost money. Since the reclamation analyzed and recommended in this article is of high quality and includes a high degree of concern for these problems, no separate cost will be assessed for control of sedimentation.

DIMINISHED RECREATIONAL VALUE

One cost of surface mining that is frequently forgotten is the diminished recreational value of disfigured land and polluted water. Hunters, campers, hikers, fishermen, and swimmers spend money in pursuit of their sports, and this expenditure is lost or greatly diminished when areas are ravaged by surface mining.

A study published in 1968 by the Bureau of Sports Fisheries and Wildlife in the Department of the Interior stated that approximately 3.2 million acres of land had been surface-mined (for all minerals, not just coal) in the U.S. from the beginning of mining through 1967. Two million of these acres (or about two-thirds) were fish and wildlife habitat damaged by the mining. The study then estimated that, if there were "minimal or basic reclamation that would control silt, sediment, and acid pollution" on these 2 million acres, two changes would occur: the number of man-days of use of the land by sportsmen would increase from 7.5 million to 40 million per year, and the recreational value of the land would therefore increase from $10 million to $58 million per year.

In other words, reclaiming 2 million acres of fish and game habitat would give a pay-off (in terms of increased use by sportsmen) of $48 million per year, or $24 per acre per year. Or, worded still another way, whenever an acre of surface-mined fish and game habitat is unreclaimed, it costs society $24 per year in terms of its diminished recreational value.

How do we translate these figures into a per-ton cost for surface-mined coal? Taking it step by step:

(1) We have already shown earlier in this article that an estimated 1.5 million acres will have to be stripped to obtain the 12 billion tons of surface-mined coal projected for the period 1970-2000. On the basis of past experience, this would mean that roughly two-thirds of this acreage, or 1 million acres, would be fish and game habitat.

(2) More than just the 1 million acres of habitat will be affected by the stripping however, since use of adjacent land is also often impaired. The Bureau of Sports Fisheries and Wildlife has reported that for every acre of land distributed in Appalachia by surface mining, use of an additional 1.25 acres has been impaired—denied to hunters, campers, hikers, and fishermen because of highwalls, piles of mine refuse, and tearing up of the landscape by machinery and trucks. So the surface mining of 1 million acres of fish and game habitat during the 30-year period would result in the impairment of an estimated total of 2.25 million acres.

(3) If each unreclaimed acre of habitat costs society $24 per year in reduced recreational use, the total cost of 2.25 million impaired acres would be $54 million ($24 times

2.25 million) for each year these acres are being mined or are not yet reclaimed after mining is completed.

(4) The next question is: How many years, on the average, will these surface-mined acres be out of commission as far as hunters and fishermen are concerned? Harry Perry estimates that an average of three to five years elapses from the time mining begins until reclamation can be started. But this is only the beginning. Some time is required to do the reclamation itself, although concurrent reclamation—reclaiming as you go during the mining operation—is more and more common. Even more significant, a long period of time must pass before the ecological balance is restored so that fish and game are again available to sportsmen. Many things must happen, and some take longer than others. Fish populations must be replenished by introducing native species into the streams or ponds. There must be a regrowth of ground cover dense enough to attract native animals back to the mined areas—and this means time to grow bushes and small trees as well as grass. These things do not happen quickly. Willard M. Spaulding, Jr., deputy regional director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, estimates that after first-rate reclamation work has been completed, it still takes an additional ten years, on the average, to develop an ecosystem that will allow sportsmen to harvest fish and game. Thomas Flynn of the Division of Environment, Bureau of Mines, confirms this estimate.

On the basis of this testimony, we assume in our analysis that it takes a total of fifteen years, on the average, to surface-mine habitat land, to do first-class reclamation, and then to restore the fish and animal populations so that sportsmen will again find the mined areas attractive.

We are now ready to calculate the per-ton social cost that results from the diminished recreational value of fish and game habitat. Remember that the total loss of recreational value has been estimated to be $54 million for each year the 2.25 million surface-mined acres were not available to sportsmen. If we multiply this $54-million annual cost by fifteen years (the average out-of-commission time), the result is a total cost of $810 million, or $0.0678 per ton for the 12 billion tons of surface-mined coal projected for the period 1970-2000.

In calculating the loss of potential production due to accidents in surface mining, the method used is the same as that used for deep mining. First, the loss will be calculated for nonfatal disabling accidents.

Item (1). Number of nonfatal disabling accidents predicted for surface mines between 1970-2000. Bureau of Mines figures for 1971 show that there were 25.86 nonfatal disabling accidents per million man-hours in surface mines. The Bureau of Mines also reported that in 1971 the average productivity in surface mining was approximately 4.5 tons per man-hour. At that rate it would take 2.667 billion (or 2,667 million) man-hours to mine the 12 billion tons of surface-mined coal projected for that period.

The number of nonfatal disabling accidents would therefore be 2,667 times 25.86, or 68,970. For ease in calculation this number will be rounded to 69,000. Thus, item (1) in the formula is 69,000.

Item (2). The average number of days lost from work per accident is 52.

Item (3). The average daily earnings in coal mining are $47.

If the total cost of $168,000,000 is divided by the 12 billion tons of coal projected to be surface-mined during the 1970-2000 period, we find that the average loss of earnings due to nonfatal disabling accidents in surface mines would be $0.014 per ton of coal mined

(at 1973 wage rates). As was true for deep mining, this estimate can be used as a measure of the loss of potential production caused by such accidents.

The loss of earnings from fatal accidents is calculated as follows:

Item (1). Number of fatal accidents predicted for surface mines between 1970-2000. Bureau of Mines figures for 1971 show 0.45 fatal accidents per million man-hours. Since surface mining 12 billion tons of coal will require 2,667 million man-hours, the total number of fatal accidents would be 2,667 times 0.45, or 1,200. Item (1) in the fraction is 1,200.

Item (2). The average number of days lost or charged per fatal accident is 6,000.

If the total cost of $368,400,000 is divided by the 12 billion tons of coal projected to be surface-mined during the 1970-2000 period, we find that the average loss of earnings due to fatal accidents in surface mines would be $0.028 per ton of coal mined (at 1973 wage rates). This loss of earnings can be used to measure the loss of potential production due to fatal accidents.

The combined loss of potential production (as measured by lost earnings) in surface mines during the 1970-2000 period is as follows:

Due to nonfatal disabling accidents, $0.014 per ton.

Due to fatal accidents, $0.028 per ton.

Total loss of potential production due to accidents in surface mines $0.042 per ton.

The estimated social costs of surface-mined coal are summarized in Table 3. They add up to $1.003 per ton, or a total of $12.033 billion for the 12 billion tons projected to be deep-mined during the period 1970-2000.

EFFECT ON COST AND PRICE

How much would the cost of producing coal increase if the social costs were added? It is impossible to answer this question, for the simple reason that it is impossible to get any authoritative information as to what production costs are in the coal industry. Coal companies consider production costs to be confidential information, and the Bureau of Mines does not gather data on the subject.

We can, however, indicate what the effect would be if social costs were added to average selling price, an increase of roughly 9 percent in the price of deep-mined coal and an almost 18 percent increase for surface-mined coal.

Even here, we are limited by the data available. The calculations are based on average U.S. selling price (F.O.B. the mine) during 1972, the latest year for which average figures are available from the Bureau of Mines. Domestic coal prices have subsequently skyrocketed; Harry Perry reports prices as high as $25 to $35 a ton for low-sulfur coal during early 1974. Of course, as selling prices rise, the burden of paying social costs becomes relatively less. If deep-mined coal is selling for $9.70 per ton, as in 1972, and you add $0.88 in social costs, the price increase is 9 percent. If the selling price goes up to $35 per ton, however, adding the $0.88 will up the price by only about 2 percent.

A WORD OF CAUTION

The various costs are not completely independent of each other, as we have emphasized several times. For example, effective backfilling of deep mines to prevent subsidence would also affect the amount of acid mine drainage from those mines. Adequate reclamation of a strip-mined area would reduce the acid mine drainage, the sedimentation, and the loss of income from recreation. To make a proper analysis of these interrelationships would require more cost data and an extremely detailed and complicated econometric model, both of which we hope will soon be available.

In the second place, all of the estimated social costs are based on certain assumptions, and some of these costs might be changed markedly if reality does not correspond with these assumptions during the last 30 years of this century. Some examples:

A change in deep-mining technology—increased use of the longwall method, for instance—would probably result in a marked decrease in the per-ton cost of preventing subsidence, the largest single social cost for deep-mined coal. Many U.S. coal companies have already made this switch, and the rate of conversion is expected to increase.

Increased productivity in deep mining, surface mining, or both, would decrease the per-ton costs of accidents. If a given number of tons of coal can be produced with fewer man-hours, and if the number of accidents per million man-hours remains the same, there will be fewer accidents—and a smaller social cost.

If the new regulations controlling the permissible levels of respirable mine dust are not properly enforced, black lung costs would have to be added into the total—and that might cause a sizable increase in the social cost of deep-mined coal.

In the third place, the average per ton cost of strip-mine reclamation in the U.S. may be affected if surface mining continues its phenomenal rate of growth in the West—but no one knows for sure just what the effect will be. Other things being equal, the thick coal seams and resulting high yields would result in lower per-ton reclamation costs. But other things are not equal. There are some special reclamation problems in the West: those big holes that are left when the deep seams are mined out, the limited moisture, and the very fragile ecosystems that may take decades or even centuries to restore. As a result, the cost and success of western reclamation are still question marks.

In the fourth place, some of the coal-mining states have already taken action to pay some of the social costs of coal. They do it by collecting taxes and fees of various kinds from the coal operators and then spending these revenues—and sometimes other revenues as well—to prevent or repair the human and environmental damage caused by the mining. The four most common sources of state revenue are: permit fees (flat sums paid to the states for all new mining operations), acreage fees (so much for each acre of land distributed by mining), severance taxes (so many cents for each ton of coal mined), and taxes on gross or net income from coal mining.

Unfortunately, most of the states have been much more interested in collecting the revenues from coal mining than in repairing the damage caused by it. As a general rule, the fees and taxes collected from coal operators have been put into the states' general revenue funds, where the money is used to pay for the regular functions of state government—many of which have little or nothing to do with the land or the people directly affected by the mining.

There are exceptions. Both West Virginia and Maryland, for example, collect acreage fees and earmark the funds for use in reclaiming abandoned or "orphan" lands damaged by mining. The Pennsylvania legislature has appropriated state funds and authorized state bond issues to pay for mine restoration projects. Several states use the acreage or permit fees they collect to pay for the enforcement agency that monitors the coal industry in the state.

Despite many inquiries, the authors were not able to obtain even an estimate of how much state revenue comes from coal mining nationwide—let alone any hard facts about how much of that revenue is used to pay social costs. From the skimpy information that is available, one thing is certain: since the social costs of coal will be an estimated $600 million per year during the last 30 years of this century, the current level of state spending for reclamation and enforcement is only a very small drop in a very large bucket.

On balance, the social costs are probably too low. They are based on some assumptions that may very well not work out quite that way—the assumptions that health and safety standards will always be rigorously enforced and that no new mine fires will break out, for example.

Even more important, the cost figures are conservative because of the impact of inflation. They are based primarily on past experience—which means that many of them are already understatements of what these same costs would be today. By the end of the century, if current inflationary trends continue, the costs will have increased substantially.

With all the ifs, ands, and buts, however, Table 3 does begin to give us a more accurate picture of what a ton of coal really costs—and hence what consumers should be paying for it. Further and more elaborate research on this question should be a high-priority item on our list of national needs.

STILL COMPETITIVE

Would coal still find a ready market if the selling price were increased by the social costs developed in this article? The answer, according to David Maneval, is definitely "yes."

The key, of course, is the price of alternative fuels, particularly those used to produce electricity, since this is the only use of coal that is subject to serious competition from other fuels.

In producing electricity, there are currently four possible fuels that can be used to produce the heat to run the generators: coal, oil, gas, and nuclear fuel. "The importance of nuclear energy is in the future, but not now," says Maneval. "Natural gas isn't a real alternative because it's in such scarce supply. So that leaves oil and coal. And between these two, coal has an enormous cost advantage. To make a cost comparison that means something in practical terms, the cost per ton of steam coal (the type of coal used to generate electricity) and the cost per barrel of crude oil must both be translated into the cost of producing a given number of BTUs. (A BTU, or British thermal unit, is a measure of heat.) At the May 1974 average market prices of steam coal ($10 per ton) and crude oil ($10 per barrel), it costs much more to produce 1 million BTUs of heat with oil than it does with coal—four to five times as much, in fact."

There is no question about it. Coal can compete with oil, even if the selling price of coal is raised to cover the social costs developed in this article. As a matter of fact, these social costs could increase substantially before coal's competitive advantage would be lost. Pay-as-you-go coal has always been an ethical imperative. It can now be a practical reality.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The authors are deeply indebted to two men for technical advice and assistance: Harry Perry, who was formerly director of research for the Bureau of Mines and is now a consultant to Resources for the Future and National Economic Research Associates; and Dr. David Maneval, who served as acting deputy secretary for mines and land protection in Pennsylvania's Department of Environmental Resources and is now science advisor of the Appalachian Regional Commission. Without their assistance this article would not have been possible. The conclusions are, however, our own and do not necessarily reflect the opinions of either expert.

OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF DEVELOPMENT AND THE COASTAL ZONE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the end of the Arab oil embargo brought about new appraisals of U.S. energy policies. Over the past year, it has become increasingly apparent that the United States will have to expand domestic energy production and institute strong conservation measures in order to decrease its reliance on foreign energy sources. These steps will be necessary, not only to meet future energy needs, but also to improve our deepening balance-of-payments problems and to insure that another oil embargo will not disrupt and disable our economic system.

One area which is expected to contribute greatly to expanded domestic production is the Outer Continental Shelf, where we are told vast acreages of oil and gas reserves wait to be tapped.

Since its creation by the Senate last February by the passage of Senate Resolution 222, the Senate's national ocean policy study, chaired by Senator HOLMSEN, has been undertaking a comprehensive analysis of the administration's oil and gas leasing programs for frontier areas on the OCS. The primary focus of this 6-month study has been the expected environmental, economic, and social impacts of drilling activities upon conditions in the coastal zone, which has necessarily led us to an evaluation of present Interior Department leasing procedures and policies.

The initial phase of the OCS study has been completed and findings and recommendations were released last month in a staff report entitled "Outer Continental Shelf Oil and Gas Development and the Coastal Zone."

A key finding of the report is that coastal States stand to undergo substantial environmental, social and economic changes as a result of offshore oil and gas development. The staff report concludes that the magnitude of the impacts necessitates that affected coastal States and local governments should be closely consulted on all phases of the leasing program and should be given an opportunity to participate in the decisionmaking as to where and when to lease. In addition, it concludes that there should be close coordination with ongoing State coastal zone management programs being developed pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972.

As to the size of the administration's planned leasing program, the staff report finds that "There is widespread doubt about whether the oil industry can cope with such a large quantity of OCS development in so short a time." The administration plans to lease in 1975 close to 10 million acres in the Atlantic, Pacific, Gulf of Alaska, and the Gulf of Mexico. Mr. President, this is as much acreage as has been leased on the Outer Continental Shelf over the last two decades—an undertaking of massive proportions. Many experts agree that it is unlikely, in view of current shortages of drilling rigs, manpower and tubular steel, that the oil and gas industry can develop even half of the acreage proposed for sale in 1975.

Such a huge sale is bound to result in a situation where the Federal Government will receive only a fraction of the potential market value of the oil and gas resources with little guarantee that these resources will be readily available to help the Nation cope with present or future shortages. In short, Mr. President, the NOPS staff finds the administration's leasing scheme to be in need of an immediate overhaul. It recommends that the leasing program be scaled down to reflect existing economic constraints on development and that it be based on sound management principles aimed at maximum benefit from the resource and minimal impact to the coastal environment. The Department of the Interior has an obligation to demonstrate prior to a lease sale that it is clearly necessary, safe, and in the public interest.

A related report which focuses on proposed leasing off southern California has also been prepared by the ocean policy study staff. This report was prepared at the request of Senator TUNNEY, who chaired a series of hearings in Santa Monica in September on the subject of the State role in OCS development. The California report, which is based on testimony gathered at the hearings, is an excellent case study of the present inadequacies of intergovernmental coordination and cooperation over OCS oil and gas leasing and forewarns of the kind of reaction Interior can expect from other coastal States as they continue to push their present leasing program. The findings and recommendations of the California study reaffirm and reemphasize those contained in the more comprehensive staff report previously mentioned.

Mr. President, the findings and recommendations of the ocean policy study staff were among the topics discussed by Senator HOLLINGS in a recent speech before the National Press Club. In his speech he outlined 12 policies which he feels are necessary in order for this Nation to cope with what is becoming an unbearable energy situation. Mr. President, I ask that the speech be printed at this point in the Record, so that my colleagues might have the benefit of this very thoughtful presentation. In addition, I ask unanimous consent that the findings and recommendations of the two recent ocean policy study staff reports be printed in their entirety in the Record along with various comments on the reports that have appeared in newspapers across the country.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

KING FAISAL'S CONSULTANT, THE U.S. ENERGY CRISIS AND THE OCEANS
(By Senator ERNEST P. HOLLINGS)

I'd like to share a complaint with you. Under the past two administrations, we've tried so hard to get along in the world that we've forgotten how to get ahead. We have become so obsessed with "detenting" that we have forgotten how to compete. We are out-produced, out-traded, and out-negotiated at every turn. We've given away our food, our technical know-how, our weapons at the drop of a foreigner's demand. And so we find ourselves running out of money, running out of oil, running out of clout and running out of time.

Who would have supposed that the Arab countries, all by themselves, could throw the United States into an economic tailspin? The truth is they've had some help—from us. The Arabs are using their economic wealth in a logical and powerful manner. It's the only weapon they have. But when they look at America, they see no sense of urgency. We haven't increased gasoline taxes. We have allowed our domestic oil prices to soar to the level of the Arab price. Cars speed past you going 75 miles an hour and the President is off watching judo in Japan.

We have an energy crisis but no energy policy. So when Kissinger begs and pleads and cajoles, the sheiks chalk it up to American politics rather than American policy and there is no give. When we make up our minds to show the Arabs we mean business by showing ourselves we mean business then we can move this country forward again.

I want to compete with the Arabs in the energy contest and I mean to lick them. Let's look at the administration game plans. The Kissinger-Simon team has opted for conservation. They say that if we can conserve 3 million barrels a day worldwide then the oil cartel will be beaten and the price will start coming down. One million barrels a day saving is America's share of the burden. Let's assume that the 3 million barrel goal is attained. The Saudis alone are producing some 8 million barrels a day, and they need to sell only 3 million a day to satisfy their wildest dreams of economic program. The King will still go laughing off to the bank.

There's another game plan put forward by the major oil companies and Secretary Morton—better known as the team of Major Morton. They say the way to lick the oil cartel is to increase production. Lease 10,000,000 acres on the Atlantic seaboard during the year 1975 and you will have the Arabs in a corner. What a cruel joke. The Arabs have the world's best consultants because they can pay and get the best—and because they are serious. King Faisal's top consultant isn't worried about the Major Morton Plan. The consultant advises: "Your Highness, relax. With the lack of money in the U.S., with the lack of drilling rigs and with the geological studies yet to be made, there isn't a chance of drawing a quart of oil from the Atlantic seaboard in less than 6 years. This game is for 4 quarters and time will run out before that plan works. Assorted teams on the U.S. side have assorted game plans. Some of them propose insulating houses, greater automobile fuel economy, more public transportation, deregulation of gas and—as a last resort—invasion. But the emphasis here, Your Highness, is assorted. As long as the Americans stay assorted, all you have to do is sit tight."

So what do the Arabs have to fear? What will make the Arabs deal? Obviously, the first step is to assimilate the assorted Americans. Package these initiatives and ideas and approaches. Package them all into one energy strategy with emphasis on American technology. And then we can get back into the game and be taken seriously.

Let me quote what your speaker, David Freeman, told you last week: "The energy crisis we face is not caused by a lack of material resources or technology. It is a political crisis." Twenty-two years before, in 1952, the Paley Study Commission issued an 8 volume report. The volume on energy contained this language: "In the past, government has dealt with energy problems largely on a piecemeal basis. . . . The hydra heads of energy policy must be reined together."

The lesson is clear: when everyone is in charge, no one is in charge. And the national interest suffers. Realizing this in the Senate, three years ago we organized the National Fuels and Energy Policy Study. Each of the energy-related committees was represented. When the Arab oil embargo hit us in late October 1973, we were geared for the battle and responded. By the 19th of December we had passed an energy policy council bill, an emergency fuel allocation bill, an energy conservation bill, an energy research and development bill and a Federal Energy Administration bill. We knew that the Executive department suffered from the same organizational dilemma and this is why we tried to provide the Energy Policy Council so the Executive could fix responsibility and respond effectively.

But the administration has not responded. And this is why the consultant can tell King Faisal: "Forget it, the Americans aren't serious." Now and again, of course, a white paper is issued, a new button ordered, and another "czar" appointed. But there's no gasoline rationing, no rollback on prices, no accelerated Manhattan-type project in energy technology. Czars come and czars go, but the major oil companies continue to control the Interior Department and day-to-day energy decision-making.

It seems to me that Major Oil operates much like a nation. Taking their text from Lord Palmerston, the companies apparently believe, "We have no permanent friends, we have no permanent enemies. We have only permanent interests." These interests being financial and primarily overseas, Major Oil makes most of its money outside of the United States. What is an energy crisis to the rest of the country can be, and indeed has become an economic boon to Major Oil. The oil companies have infiltrated governments abroad and of course they have had a home for decades in Washington in the House of Oil, better known as the Department of the Interior.

Secretary Morton had this to say while briefing oil executives in the White House on August 16, 1973: "Our mission is to serve you, not regulate you. We try to avoid it. I have tried to avoid regulation to the degree that I possibly can."

So when the consultant advises King Faisal, he must tell him that Major Oil has an energy policy, courtesy of Secretary Morton, but the rest of the United States doesn't—and can't until the Major Morton connection is broken. The President had a few things to say about energy in his recent WIN message. He labeled energy as the chief culprit of inflation and then proposed to remove the only protection consumers of energy now enjoy by deregulating natural gas, thereby adding some $10 to $11 billion to the nation's already inflated energy bill. That's a LOSE program for sure. But the members applauded.

We had better wake up. First, we should institute in the White House an Energy Policy Council. This group should be responsible for correlating all the information that is necessary to an energy policy, and then coordinating its implementation through a national strategy.

We must acknowledge what King Faisal's consultant knows and the American people should be told—our ox is in the ditch. There is no one solution to our energy fix. We must move forward deliberately on all fronts. Next, conservation. Cut that speed limit and ration that gas. There are too many political hurdles to a gasoline tax increase.

So let's not play around. Issue the ration stamps that have been printed and accelerate the regulations for improved automobile fuel economy. Move faster to improve public transportation. Tell the Secretary of Housing to announce new regulations for insulation requirements no later than January 1. Adopt a schedule for generating plants to convert from oil to coal. Quit palavered about regulation versus deregulation of natural gas and put in a statutory formula that will constitute a generous profit for the gas developer balanced off with a fair price to the consumer. Fix a time limit on the unpardonable procrastination of the Federal Power Commission decisions. Announce a Manhattan Project in nuclear fusion and coal gasification. Pass the strip mining bill and start mining the coal. Start drilling the oil. Proclaim the reserves of Teapot Dome and Elk Hills for defense. But state candidly that the emergency warrants drilling Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 4—now. Petroleum Reserve No. 4 and the Gulf of Mexico fields can be brought in a good two years earlier than anything along the Atlantic seaboard. In two years the States can determine environmental impact and firm up the Coastal Zone Management plans. Don't delay drilling to plan. Drill immediately where you have planned. And plan immediately so that you can drill. Delay Atlantic and Pacific frontier area drilling as a business judgement, not environmental.

Before we lease the Atlantic and Pacific to the oil companies, we ought to do some government sponsored exploratory drilling. It is pitiful to see Secretary Morton say we are going to lease but we don't know where and we don't know what. He wants to lease 10,000,000 acres of oil now—but for 30 million bucks to balance the budget. Bonus bidding has always been a favorite of the Secretaries of the Treasury. But even Major Oil lacks 30 billion—and a giveaway to the oil companies is ensured. This is why leasing has always dovetailed with the plans of Major Oil. They buy cheap and sell high. At the moment, they have no idea of developing proposed leases along the Atlantic. Already they are moving to stretch out the 5 year requirement for production to 10 years on the basis of the lack of steel or drilling equipment. It is also pitiful to see this same needed drilling equipment going abroad to the far corners of the earth during the past bleak year while we are all crying for more domestic production or proclaiming Operation Independence. The 10,000,000 acre leasing program off the Atlantic and Pacific at this time is a fraud on the American public. It will produce no energy in the next few years when we need it. It will only divert our attention from the sources that already have been found and that could be developed immediately. By trying to develop everything, Major Morton develops nothing.

Clearly the problems of offshore drilling and energy supply give impetus to the need for a national ocean policy. What happens when a productive oil field is found beneath lucrative fishing grounds, or when drilling rigs must be built in the center of busy shipping lanes, or when pipelines carrying offshore oil pass through an estuarine area of particular importance? Who plays traffic cop for all these interests? Who mediates the public interest and the special interest? As in energy, we need an ocean policy. As in energy, we in the Senate have instituted the National Ocean Policy Study. The 1969 recommendation of the Stratton Commission for an independent agency should be implemented at once. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, presently within the Department of Commerce, is the logical nucleus.

The oceans will make or break this planet of ours. They are our ultimate life support system. Yet even as I speak, the oceans are dying. Jacques Cousteau, the oceanographer, testified before the Congress. The day before he testified he had fish for lunch in Malta but he explained that the fish were caught off the shores of faraway Iceland. The Mediterranean was dying. And the Black Sea was dead. He testified that the coastal waters around the several continents had been dying at an accelerated rate. By the year 2000, 35% of these waters would be dead. Fifty percent would mean the beginning of the end of life. Thor Heyerdahl also testified about his raft voyage across the Atlantic from Morocco to the Barbados. On only 3 of the 43 days at sea could he dip his toothbrush into the mid-ocean because of oil slicks. Coastal oil is a one-time crop. It must be harvested—but without injury to the coastal zone. For here we have fish. Here we have our people. These are life-time crops—and more. Life was born in the ocean, evolved in the ocean. With Cousteau and Heyerdahl we have reached the Age of Environment. With King Faisal we have reached the Age of Energy. These ages meet down at the sea. Or they can end there. A reconciliation is in order.

EXCERPTS FROM OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS DEVELOPMENT AND THE COASTAL ZONE, A STAFF REPORT OF NATIONAL OCEAN POLICY STUDY, SENATE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, NOVEMBER 1974

I. DISCUSSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

This report will set forth some of the major issues involved in OCS leasing and recommend improvements in current procedures and practices. It draws upon the hearings held by the National Ocean Policy Study of the Committee on Commerce and additional hearings before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It also benefits from several recent studies, including those conducted by the Council on Environmental Quality (Summary, Appendix F.), the University of Oklahoma (Summary, Appendix G.), and the National Academies of Science and Engineering (Appendixes H and I, respectively).

A. Discussion

Approximately six million acres of federally-owned lands on the Outer Continental Shelf are currently under lease for oil and gas development, and that number may increase substantially in the near future.

The Department of the Interior, at the direction of Presidents Nixon and Ford, has disclosed its intention to lease 10 million acres of OCS lands for oil and gas development in 1975. To achieve this goal, the Department may offer as much as 19.1 million acres in the Atlantic, the Gulf of Alaska, the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific off California. If successful, this sudden acceleration of OCS leasing would double in a single year the total acreage leased during the previous 21 years of Federal OCS leasing, and would open up hitherto untapped areas to exploration.

Recent energy shortages and interruptions of imported oil supplies are the motivating force behind the planned expansion of OCS oil and gas development. Additionally, the quadrupling of world oil prices following the 1973 Middle East war has been a major contributor to inflation and has strained the balance of payments position of the United States, making domestic oil development even more attractive. However, offshore leasing would not immediately relieve shortages, interruptions or foreign price pressures, since it takes about five years from the time of a lease sale before oil and gas can be produced on an offshore tract in commercial quantities. In the short term, energy conservation offers the only real possibility for reducing oil imports.

Public disclosure of the 1975 leasing program has aroused concern in many quarters, including the Congress and the coastal States. While few quarrel with the general goal of expanding OCS oil and gas development, many are concerned lest the precipitous leasing of so many acres in a single year cause coastal states and communities environmental harm and create administrative, financial and technical problems beyond the capability of the Federal government and the oil industry to handle.

There is very little coordination or communication between the Interior Department and the coastal States prior to OCS lease sales, despite the significant impact that OCS operations have on State coastal zones.

The only major role played by States prior to OCS leasing is to exercise their right to comment on environmental impact statements which the Bureau of Land Management prepares before each lease sale, in compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969. This means that State participation does not begin until after the Interior Department has decided when, where and how much OCS acreage will be offered.

States and communities adjacent to past and present offshore oil developments have incurred significant environmental, economic and social costs. Direct costs include environmental degradation from the siting of refineries, pipeline terminals, tank storage farms, supply bases, petrochemical plants and other hydrocarbon-related facilities in the coastal zone. Substantial risks of large-scale accidental pollution from oil spills also face coastal States, as do the largely unknown effects of chronic low-level discharges of oil into the marine environment. Indirect effects include changes in land use (including loss of valuable wetlands), shifting populations and employment patterns, housing demand, and the required expansion of public facilities such as schools, roads, police and fire protection. A recent study found that the negative economic impact of Federal offshore development on the State government of Louisiana in 1972 equaled $38 million.¹

When Federally-owned mineral resources are produced onshore, affected States receive royalties of 37½ percent and, in many cases, additional reclamation funds which bring the State share to 90 percent of revenues. With offshore oil, on the other hand, States receive no royalties or severance taxes on resources produced. While costs and benefits should also be examined on a national basis, coastal States would clearly realize a more equitable share of costs and benefits if they received financial assistance in coping with the onshore impact of offshore oil.

If the 1975 leasing program goes forward as presently planned, without policy changes, it could exacerbate serious problems which are evident in current leasing and management practices for the Outer Continental Shelf.

There is evidence that regulation of environmental and safety practices in OCS oil and gas operations is inadequate. The U.S. Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior has primary responsibility for issuing and enforcing orders which govern oil company practices. Two recent studies found that the USGS did not enforce its orders to the fullest extent, but often issued only oral warnings about violations when written notices or fines were called for.² In addition, the orders themselves appear to need strengthening. The USGS has permitted the industry being regulated to comment on proposed regulations prior to their publication in the Federal Register for public comment. The Subcommittee on Conservation and Natural Resources of the House of Representatives' Government Operations Committee has contended that the practice of circulating proposed orders to the industry's Offshore Operators Committee is a violation of the Administrative Procedures Act and is "not in the public interest", since the strength of the orders may be compromised.³

In view of these shortcomings, there is cause for concern about the ability of the U.S. Geological Survey to effectively regulate the vast acreage contemplated for leasing in 1975.

A serious defect in the current OCS leasing and management program is the inadequacy of information about resources and reserves. While the USGS collects a substantial amount of raw data—including maps of productive formations, core samples, and well logs indicating drilling success or failure, the agency lacks sufficient manpower or funds to analyse, interpret or translate these data into useful information comprehensible to coastal planners, energy policy-makers and other members of the interested public. Instead, the Survey relies on data compilations prepared by industry trade associations—the American Gas Association and the American Association of Petroleum Geologists. Different estimates of potential resources and reserves in frontier areas of the OCS vary by as much as an order of magnitude. A major reason for the Federal government's lack of reliable independent information about the resources it owns is the fact that it does not conduct any exploratory drilling and only limited seismic and geophysical studies. A large-scale exploration program in frontier areas, sponsored and administered by the U.S. Geological Survey rather than by private industry, would greatly improve the government's resource data base and improve the Interior Department's efforts to receive revenues for oil and gas which truly represent a fair market value.

The usual bonus bidding system—in which oil companies place competitive bids for OCS tracts—gives the competitive edge to the largest companies with the greatest capital reserves. While small independent companies often participate in OCS leases as minority share-holders in joint ventures, they are generally unable to introduce a truly competitive element into the bidding through majority holdings. Alternative leasing systems are permitted under the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act of 1953, and their implementation might alleviate this situation and restore effective competition among prospective bidders. One such system is the "royalty bidding" option, which the Interior Department tested in an October 1974 lease sale. Under this system, bidders compete in offering to pay the Federal government a percentage of the value of the oil produced, and pay only small, fixed bonus fees at the time of the lease sale. A third system would base competitive bidding on the percentage of net profits that companies were willing to pay to the government. Both the royalty and the profit sharing systems would reduce the amount of initial capital companies would have to pay, thereby eliminating a barrier to bidding for small companies.

The present leasing system also fails to guarantee the timely development of resources under lease. While the lease theoretically expires after five years if no development takes place, the U.S. Geological Survey routinely extends the lease period at the operator's request.

There is widespread doubt about whether the oil industry can cope with such a large quantity of OCS development in so short a time.

Never before has the Interior Department offered more than three million acres for lease during a single year. It is unlikely, in light of current shortages of drilling rigs, manpower and tubular goods, that the oil and gas industry would be in a position to develop promptly all of the tracts on which it makes successful bids, if, in fact, it purchases 10 million acres.²

Even more important, under the bonus bidding system the capital requirements for such a large leasing program are enormous. Bonus bids on oil and gas tracts in recent sales have averaged between $2,000 and $5,000 per acre. To offer an average of $3,000 an acre on 10 million acres, the industry would need $30 million worth of capital just for bonus payments at the time of sale. This does not include the costs incurred by the industry in drilling exploration wells, developing tracts where oil or gas is discovered, or making royalty payments to the government on resources produced. In the face of these enormous capital requirements, even the highly profitable oil industry would experience cash flow problems.

In actual experience, however, the oil industry is likely to limit its annual capital investment in bonuses to a lower level by placing far lower average bids on the acreage leased. This is because of the need to spread its financial resources out over such a large quantity of offerings, and because of the financial uncertainty inherent in leasing in new areas where information about potential resources is scarce. Where promising geophysical data do exist, competition will prevail and bids will be high; in other areas, there may be no bids at all. Until exploratory drilling begins on the Atlantic, and the Gulf of Alaska, financial risks will be great for both the companies and the government. If significant quantities of oil and gas are found in frontier areas, the rapid leasing policy could result in the Federal government receiving revenues representing only a small fraction of the potential market value of those resources.

It remains unclear what part OCS leasing in 1975 is intended to play in the larger context of national energy policy.

Despite several Federal organizational changes, including the creation of the Federal Energy Administration, the Energy Research and Development Administration, the Nuclear Energy Commission and the Energy Resources Council, the nation still lacks a coherent national energy policy. Without such policy, it is impossible to determine whether or not the nation needs to lease 10 million acres of offshore lands in 1975. It is clear, however, that such a massive leasing program will do little to alleviate oil and gas shortages in the next few years and that energy conservation is the only means of reducing oil imports during this period.

The Senate recently passed the Energy Supply Act of 1974 (S. 3221) which would substantially improve the OCS leasing and management system.

Although the House of Representatives has not acted with respect to OCS legislation, making it unlikely that such legislation will become law in the 93rd Congress, there appears to be a growing momentum for OCS reform early in the 94th Congress.

The Senate bill improves OCS leasing and management practices in several ways. For example, it requires the Secretary of the Interior to prepare a 10-year leasing program, which would be updated annually. To develop the program, the Department must consult with the States and allow for public participation. The bill specifies further that the environmental impact statement on the leasing program must include an assessment of how the program fits into the larger picture of energy supply, a description of the environmental hazards posed in each proposed leasing area, and a discussion of the industry capability to develop the acreage leased. Furthermore, the Senate bill calls on the Secretary to conduct a large-scale survey of federal oil and gas resources to improve the Department's and the public's knowledge about these federally owned resources.

The new bill also offers substantial improvements in the environmental and safety regulation of OCS operations. It calls for strong performance standards, more frequent inspections, and stiffer fines for violations. It requires OCS operators to use the best available technology in the hazardous segments of drilling operations. It provides for strict liability for oil spills, and sets up an Offshore Oil Pollution Settlement Fund, financed by a tax of 2½ cents on each barrel of oil produced, to compensate fishermen, coastal land owners, or others damages by oil spills.

The OCS bill also calls for a report to Congress on the relative advantages of different leasing systems, including bonus bidding, royalty bidding, and net profit sharing.

A key feature of the new legislation is the establishment of a Coastal State Fund. Together with grants to States under the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972, this Fund will greatly assist States in alleviating the impacts of offshore oil and gas development upon coastal lands. The Fund will come from oil revenues—up to 10 per cent of total royalties and bonuses, limited to $200 million annually.

The Senate has clearly established its leadership and commitment to reform OCS leasing and management policies and has demonstrated a clear understanding of impacts within the coastal zone caused by OCS-related energy facilities siting. This makes it all the more important for new leasing programs now proposed by the Secretary of the Interior to conform to the intent of the State with respect to State participation, long-range planning of leasing programs, and sound environmental and safety practices in OCS operations.

B. RECOMMENDATIONS

1. There should be early enactment of legislation to improve OCS policies and practices, along the lines of the Energy Supply Act of 1974 (S. 3221) as passed by the Senate on September 18, 1974.

Following extensive hearings and investigations by two United States Senate Committees, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the National Ocean Policy Study of the Committee on Commerce, the Energy Supply Act was approved by the Senate by a roll call vote of 64 to 23. This action by the Senate came in the face of opposition from the White House, the Department of the Interior and spokesmen for some of the major integrated multinational oil companies. This Act, significantly amending the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act of 1953, should receive the prompt attention of the 94th Congress. Moreover, the Congress should consider additional amendments requiring public access to information, government-sponsored exploration by the USGS (including drilling exploratory wells in frontier areas) and further research and experimentation on alternative leasing systems by the Secretary of the Interior. At the same time, Congress should, through research, hearings and other means, closely examine and consider whether alternative Federal organizational mechanisms are necessary to deal with the developmental, research and regulatory responsibilities associated with OCS oil and gas, which are now performed primarily by the Department of the Interior.

2. No leasing of offshore oil and gas lands should occur in frontier areas until the Interior Department demonstrates that such leasing is clearly necessary, safe, and in the public interest.

Several steps should be taken prior to leasing in frontier areas of the Atlantic, the Gulf of Alaska and the Pacific.

(a) Affected coastal States should be allotted emergency grants for special studies, to be completed within nine months of grant appropriation, to determine the critical issues that adjacent OCS leasing would pose for their Coastal Zones. The results of these studies should be available to the public and evaluated by the Interior Department, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Office of Coastal Zone Management, the Council on Environmental Quality, and the Review Panel of the National Academy of Sciences before leasing.

(b) Environmental baseline studies of proposed leasing areas, which are currently underway, should be completed, published and evaluated by CEQ and the NAS Review Panel.

(c) A leasing schedule which begins with the areas of least environmental risk and potential socio-economic disruption should be drawn up.

(d) The Interior Department should demonstrate that it has exerted all possible effort to ensure that previously-leased tracts are developed and produced in a prompt and timely manner before leasing in frontier areas.

EXCERPTS FROM OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS LEASING OFF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA: ANALYSIS OF ISSUES, A STAFF REPORT OF THE NATIONAL OCEAN POLICY STUDY, SENATE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, NOVEMBER 1974

II. FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

A. The Department of the Interior's massive leasing schedule for OCS oil and gas resources, aimed at six sales per year, beginning in 1975, should be replaced with a more modest level of leasing, avoiding frontier areas until (1) Congress enacts legislation similar to S. 3221 or administrative procedures are developed so as to insure that Federal, State, local and public interests are properly considered in OCS leasing decisions, (2) coastal States have been given a reasonable time to undertake the development of coastal zone management programs to accommodate the demands of offshore oil and gas development, and (3) a comprehensive evaluation of the Programmatic Environmental Impact Statement and Blueprint of Project Independence is made and reviewed by competent authorities.

1. Energy conservation is a feasible alternative to accelerated development of OCS oil and gas resources during the interim while the leasing policies and procedures are being reappraised.

2. In view of constraints posed by shortages in drilling rigs, construction materials and investment capital, the oil industry's capability to develop lease tracts each year is limited. Consequently, the temporary deferral of some lease sales in frontier areas would not significantly delay petroleum supplies.

3. All of the coastal states which would be affected by the 1975 accelerated lease schedule are drafting coastal zone management programs in accordance with the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972. California, in particular, is in the advanced stages of development, with 1975 as its target date for completion. Within two years most of the coastal states will be substantially finished with their plans.

B. The Department of the Interior should reassess its OCS leasing system to develop a pre-lease procedure which includes substantive participation by State, local, and regional representatives in all determinations or decisions from nomination to sale, coupled with full and candid disclosure of pending decisions and supporting information.

1. Department testimony indicated that the Department of the Interior considers the environmental impact statement process required by NEPA after nomination of specific tracts to be the primary vehicle for input for state, local and regional interests. According to State and local officials, however, the Department failed to consult or warn them sufficiently in advance of the announcement of the call for tract nominations; and the determination to issue the call was made unilaterally by the Department.

2. The Department of the Interior uses a highly technical approach to interpret and administer the regulations promulgated under the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. One example is the determination that the "call for nominations" is not a "decision;" that a "decision" is not made until it is decided which tracts are to be sold. While perhaps technically defensible, the non-federal witnesses did not consider the distinction as a reason not to fully consult state and local representatives prior to the call for nominations.

3. Government credibility is at low ebb. Underlying the testimony of many Southern California witnesses appeared the attitude that Federal Government representatives are not trustworthy, that decisions and commitments to the oil and gas industry have already been made, and that the environmental impact statements and other planning documents are pro forma.

C. The Federal government should have the primary responsibility for exploration and exploratory drilling so that the proprietary rights to information about the extent and location of OCS oil and gas are with the public. Until such exploratory activities are undertaken by the Federal Government, the Department of the Interior should make estimates of the numbers and types of facilities needed for production, refining, and transportation of OCS oil and gas based on the best data available.

1. While the USGS has responsibility for general exploration on the OCS lands, the detailed resource information is generally acquired by the industry and treated as proprietary. This imbalance in resource information casts doubt on the Government's ability to assess the value of oil and gas resources and ensure the American taxpayer receipt of fair market value in its sale to private companies.

2. The present nomination—pre-lease procedures do not provide adequate and timely information necessary for state and local planning. State and local officials in California emphasized the need for planning information, e.g. number and location of drilling platforms, locations of pipelines, location and size of refineries and processing facilities and transportation and service requirements. Such data are not available from the present leasing procedures until after the lease sale and discoveries are made by the lessee.

D. The Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) in cooperation with the Office of Coastal Zone Management of NOAA should convene an interagency task force to assess the programs of the Federal agencies as to their impact on the coastal zone, and to establish guidelines for achieving the objectives of the Coastal Zone Management Act and, more specifically, the "Federal consistency" provisions of the Act.

1. Testimony by the Department of the Interior indicated that Federal agencies read the mandate of the Coastal Zone Management Act narrowly in the legal sense, and tend to diminish the operation of the broad objectives of Federal-State cooperative planning. The "Federal consistency" provisions are subject to interpretation; thus it is the responsibility of the Executive Branch to determine a course of action which will respect the legislative mandate for protecting and managing the coastal zone, while pursuing national goals through actions of the Federal agencies.

2. The National Environmental Policy Act and the Coastal Zone Management Act are the two primary planning devices to achieve balanced land use and environmental protection. Because of their importance to coastal zone management, detailed consideration should be given to the interaction and mutual roles of the two statutes in relation to the missions of the Federal agencies.

E. The Department of the Interior should provide appropriate committees of Congress with a complete justification of its leasing program before leasing additional acreage in frontier areas. Such a justification should take into account the availability of capital, materials and manpower, the ability of the major oil companies to develop such large acreage at this time, and the ability of the U.S. Geological Survey to properly administer such a sizable area.

F. The final programmatic environmental impact statement of the expanded Federal OCS Leasing Program should include a comprehensive assessment of the onshore support facilities such as infrastructure, platform construction sites, pipeline landfalls, storage tank farms, refineries and tanker terminals. The impact statement should estimate the secondary impacts such as population growth, land use changes, need for new infrastructure, employment dislocations, and economic changes such as inflation in land and housing prices. In addition, the site specific impact statement should give more detailed attention to these factors as they affect Southern California and other affected coastal States.

HOLLINGS DENOUNCES OFFSHORE "FRAUD"
(By George C. Wilson)

The Interior Department's plan to lease 10 million acres of Atlantic and Pacific sea bottom to oil companies next year "is a fraud on the American public," Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.) has charged.

Hollings, who is chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee's ocean policy study group, further charged in a recent speech before the National Press Club that the industry has shut down thousands of wells offshore which could be producing oil today.

The 10-million acre leasing program, he said, is a fraud because "it will produce no energy in the next few years when we need it. It will only divert our attention from the sources that already have been found and that could be developed immediately."

Hollings claimed energy sources that could be developed immediately include offshore wells that have been "shut in," or closed down. The number went from 953 in 1971 to 2,966 in 1972 to 3,054 in 1973, Hollings said.

Wilson Laird, director of exploration of the American Petroleum Institute, called Hollings' figures misleading and said they do not represent wells that could produce oil.

The U.S. Geological Survey, Laird said, took the 1971 figure for shut-ins from the state of Louisiana and then made its own calculations for 1972 and 1973 under a different method. That is why the difference between the latter two years is so much less than the gap between 1971 and 1972, he said.

Also, the figures do not represent wells but individual drill pipes within one well that reach oil at different depths, or zones, Laird said. Eighty per cent of the zones within the wells no longer produce oil but each pipe into them is listed as a shut-in, he said.

Several members of the House small business regulatory agencies subcommittee have complained that the Geological Survey has no adequate way to keep track of shut-ins and judge whether they could produce oil. Hollings in his speech lamented the government's inability to determine for itself where the most productive oil fields offshore are located.

"Before we lease the Atlantic and Pacific to the oil companies," he said, "we ought to do some government-sponsored exploratory drilling. It is pitiful to see Secretary of Interior Rogers (C. B.) Morton say we are going to lease, but we don't know where, and we don't know what."

OFFSHORE LEASE PLAN NEEDS MORE STUDY, SENATE STAFF ADVISES

WASHINGTON.—A Senate staff report urged the Interior Department to put brakes on its plan to lease 10 million acres of offshore lands for oil and gas development next year. The report noted widespread concern that "the precipitous leasing of so many acres in a single year (could) cause coastal states and communities environmental and technical problems beyond the capability of the federal government and the oil industry to handle."

The staff report is part of a National Ocean Policy Study commissioned by the Senate last February. The study group is composed of Senators from eight legislative committees that deal with policies affecting oceans.

Using the decorous language of a formal congressional report, the group's staff urged that before new offshore lands are leased in the Atlantic, the Gulf of Alaska and the Pacific, coastal states should be allowed more time to study the effects of the proposed drilling activities. The staff also urged passage next year of legislation tightening the Interior Department's leasing procedures. The Senate approved such a bill this year, but it died in the House.

Decorous language wasn't used in a speech to the National Press Club yesterday by Sen. Ernest Hollings (D., S.C.), chairman of the ocean policy study. "The 10-million-acre leasing program off the Atlantic and Pacific at this time is a fraud on the American public," he said. "It will produce no energy in the next few years when we need it. It will only divert our attention from the sources that already have been found and that could be developed immediately."

Coastal state governors already have been protesting the Interior Department's leasing plan. The opposition has showed signs of forcing the department to back away from its 1975 leasing target.

On Monday, for example, the agency announced a two-month delay in hearings scheduled on the leasing plan, although it said the delay wouldn't affect the timetable for the sale.

HOLLINGS CALLS FOR IMMEDIATE GASOLINE RATIONING

WASHINGTON.—The chairman of a Senate study critical of administration oil policies called for immediate gasoline rationing Tuesday "to show the Arabs we mean business."

Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, D-S.C., in issuing the Senate staff study, also urged a "Manhattan Project," emphasis on energy research and the opening of Naval Petroleum Reserve Number Four in Alaska to commercial oil production.

But he advised delaying offshore oil leasing in untouched areas of the Atlantic and Pacific, charging that the Interior Department's plans to lease 10 million offshore acres in 1975 was a potential "giveaway" and "a fraud on the American public."

Hollings, chairman of a Senate National Ocean Policy Study Committee, aired his recommendations about energy policy in a speech at the National Press Club.

The Senate staff report, also critical of the Interior Department's offshore plans, urged the department to bar petroleum operations in "frontier areas" offshore unless it can prove they would be both safe and necessary.

The report suggested federal, not private, exploration of new offshore areas; nine-month studies of offshore oil impacts by the coastal states; and Interior Department efforts to stimulate full development of areas already leased before new areas are opened.

In his speech, Hollings charged that "the major oil companies continue to control the Interior Department and day-to-day energy decision making," and have no intention of developing proposed offshore leases in the Atlantic.

Interior Secretary Rogers C. B. Morton's proposal to lease 10 million offshore acres in 1975, as much as was leased during the previous 20 years, would only drive down the bidding by oil companies for the leases, Hollings said.

"A giveaway to the oil companies is ensured," he charged.

Hollings said U.S. attempts to reduce world oil prices would not be taken seriously by the Arab oil producers until the United States itself takes serious action at home.

"There are too many political hurdles to a gasoline tax increase," Hollings said.

"So let's not play around. Issue the ration stamps that have been printed and accelerate the regulations for improved automobile fuel economy."

With other proposals, Hollings also urged a "Manhattan Project," like the all-out federal development of the atom bomb during World War II, for development of nuclear fission and coal gasification, unlocking huge new energy resources.

Hollings later told a reporter he thought rationing is essential to achieve President Ford's goal of saving one million barrels of oil a day.

"It's not going to work out voluntarily," Hollings said. In his speech, Hollings also urged:

"Move faster to improve public transportation.

"Tell the secretary of housing to announce new regulations for insulation requirements no later than Jan. 1.

"Adopt a schedule for generating plants to convert from oil to coal.

"Quit palavering about regulations versus deregulation of natural gas (by the Federal Power Commission) and put in a statutory formula that will constitute a generous profit for the gas developer balanced off with a fair price to the consumer."

Proposing to authorize commercial oil production from the naval petroleum reserve in Alaska, Hollings said oil from there and from the Gulf of Mexico "can be brought in a good two years earlier than anything along the Atlantic seaboard."

"Before we lease the Atlantic and Pacific to the oil companies, we ought to do some government-sponsored exploratory drilling," Hollings said.

"It is pitiful to see Secretary Morton say we are going to lease but we don't know where and we don't know what."

OUTPUT CURB LAD TO OIL COMPANIES; SENATOR SAYS BIG PRODUCERS ARE HOLDING BACK OFFSHORE

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, Nov. 26.—Senator Ernest F. Hollings suggested today that the major United States oil companies were engaged in "speculative withholding" of oil and gas production from offshore "productive zones" under leases purchased from the Federal Government.

The South Carolina Democrat is chairman of the National Ocean Policy Study, a group created by the Senate last February within the Commerce Committee after President Nixon's announcement that the Interior Department would lease 10 million acres on the Atlantic and Pacific continental shelves to the oil companies in 1975.

In a question period after a speech today at the National Press Club, Mr. Hollings cited evidence from two Government agencies that he said, indicated that the oil companies, to guarantee maximum profits, were holding back production by using "shut-ins" of offshore leases in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department's Geological Survey has called the areas proven "productive zones," Mr. Hollings said.

COMPLETED AND CAPPED

A "shut-in" is a well in which drilling has been completed and the well capped. A completed shut-in productive zone is defined by the Geological Survey as one capable of producing oil or gas in paying quantities. A single well may have more than one productive zone.

Senator Hollings cited a study last June by the Geological Survey showing that shut-in oil productive zones off-shore had jumped from 853 in 1971 to 2,966 in 1972 and to 3,054 in 1973, while active oil wells fell from 5,704 in 1971 to 4,744 in 1972 and 3,814 in 1973.

The survey noted that this decline in active wells had taken place even though new well completions continued over this three-year period at the rate of 300 to 400 a year.

Another study, by the Federal Power Commission last January, of 168 offshore shut-in productive gas leases estimated that these areas contained proved reserves of 4.7 trillion cubic feet and an additional 3.3 trillion cubic feet in probable reserves of gas. The total amounted to two-and-one-half times the gas produced in 1973 from offshore wells.

In a paper presented to a Brookings Institution panel in September, Prof. Paul Davidson of Rutgers University said that since most oil and gas producers "can expect rapidly rising prices," the jump in shut-ins "does suggest an explicit decision to restrict available offshore production." Senator Hollings's group is going to inquire into these shut-ins.

In his speech, Mr. Hollings advocated creation of a White House energy policy council since, he said, policy development could not be left to Secretary of the Interior Rogers C. B. Morton and his aides. Mr. Morton is also head of the Federal Energy Resources Council.

"Czars come and czars go," Mr. Hollings said, "but the major oil companies continue to control the Interior Department."

SENATE PANEL ASKS SHARP CURBS ON DEVELOPING NEW OFFSHORE OIL

WASHINGTON.—A Senate group urged Tuesday that the Interior Department keep oil and gas development out of untouched offshore areas unless it could prove their development was both necessary and safe.

And Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), chairman of the study group, called for immediate gasoline rationing "to show the Arabs we mean business."

The study of offshore oil leasing was the first report by the staff of the Senate's National Ocean Policy Study. Hollings issued it to news media.

The study sharply criticized the Interior Department's management of offshore oil leases and its plans to lease about 10 million offshore acres in 1975, doubling in a single year the acreage leased during the last 20 years.

The study concluded that the department had too little information to justify or manage such a vast leasing program and said it should be scaled down to "a more realistic lease target based on sound management practices for publicly owned resources."

The report suggests that the federal government itself explore new offshore areas to determine where oil and gas are situated, rather than leasing unexplored areas to oil companies at what may later turn out to have been bargain-basement prices.

The Interior Department agreed Monday to postpone for 60 days the public hearings it had scheduled for December on the environmental impact of its planned 10-million-acre 1975 leasing program.

It acted at the urging of the state of California, which said too little time had been allowed to study the massive draft environmental impact statement published by the department, Oct. 21.

Secretary of the Interior Rogers C. B. Morton has indicated that the full 10 million acres may not be leased but that the department was planning to offer leases on "frontier" areas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and in the Gulf of Alaska.

The new Senate staff report urged, however, that "no leasing . . . should occur in frontier areas until the Interior Department demonstrates that such leasing is clearly necessary, safe and in the public interest."

It said the coastal states should be given nine months, and emergency federal grants, to conduct their own studies of offshore oil and its impact on them.

Hollings, in issuing the study, urged a crash program of energy research and the opening of Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 4 in Alaska to commercial oil production.

But he advised delaying offshore oil leasing in untouched areas of the Atlantic and Pacific, charging that the Interior Department's plan to lease 10 million offshore acres in 1975 was a potential giveaway and "a fraud on the American public."

In a speech at the National Press Club, Hollings said that "the major oil companies continue to control the Interior Department and day-to-day energy decision-making" and had no intention of developing proposed offshore leases in the Atlantic.

Leasing of 10 million offshore acres in 1975 would drive down the bidding by oil companies for the leases, Hollings said.

He said U.S. attempts to reduce world oil prices would not be taken seriously by the Arab oil producers until the United States took serious action at home.

STATES TOLD U.S. WILL SLOW OFFSHORE OIL DRILLING PROJECT

(By George C. Wilson)

The Interior Department told California officials yesterday that it would reduce the speed and scope of its program to tap new areas of sea floor off the East and West Coasts for oil.

Secretary of the Interior Rogers C. B. Morton said he would postpone for 60 days the hearings scheduled for December where state officials would have reacted to the federal government's plan to lease 10 million acres of sea bottom of oil companies in 1975.

Morton also reiterated during a meeting with California officials at his office that his department is no longer counting on leasing the full 10 million. But he disclosed no new target.

The postponement of hearings came as California threatened to sue the Interior Department in U.S. District Court here for not giving state officials enough time to assess the impact of accelerated offshore drilling.

Bert Pines, Los Angeles city attorney, said the complaint he had drafted argued that the National Environmental Policy Act required the federal government to give states sufficient time to evaluate the environmental impact of such government actions as offshore drilling.

The states of Massachusetts, Oregon and Washington would have joined California in suing on those grounds, Pines said.

"The hearings will be the only time people will have to speak their minds on this major program," Pines said in an interview. Without a postponement, he added, "you're just getting trampled upon."

The basic document state officials are trying to digest as they grope for policy positions is Interior's environmental impact statement on offshore drilling—a document over 2,000 pages long put out last month and not yet in the hands of some state officials.

Richard Maullin, energy adviser to California Gov. elect Edmund G. Brown Jr., said Brown has not received a copy yet and is thus in no position to react to it. Pines said California will spend between $45,000 and $60,000 to have the National Academy of Sciences evaluate the impact statement.

Armed with that and other information, California officials intend to testify at Interior's hearings, which will be rescheduled for early February.

California Democratic Sens. Alan Cranston and John V. Tunney and Republican Rep. Alphonzo Bell met with Morton yesterday to request the postponement.

Interior officials have been backing away for weeks from their stated goal of leasing 10 million acres in 1975—as evidence mounted that the oil industry would have trouble finding the capital, drilling rigs and manpower for that vast an undertaking.

The Senate's National Ocean Policy Study, a Commerce Committee group chaired by Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), took note in a staff report released yesterday of this shortage and other flaws in Interior's 10 million-acre plan. Said the report:

"There is widespread doubt about whether the oil industry can cope with such a large quantity of outer-continental-shelf development in so short a time"—warning that the shortage of capital could result in offshore land being leased for less than its full value.

"The nation still lacks a coherent national energy policy" so "it is impossible to determine whether or not the nation needs to lease 10 million acres of offshore lands in 1975," the report added.

OFFSHORE DRILLINGS A "FRAUD"?

A new report from a special Senate ocean policy study group suggests, in the words of Senator Ernest F. Hollings, that the Interior Department's plans to lease Atlantic and Pacific offshore areas for oil drilling represent a "fraud." Strong as this may sound, the report itself tends to back up this assessment.

From the point of view of Marylanders, the most glaring omission in Interior's plans (according to the report) is the agency's failure to consider the impact of offshore drilling on populated and unpopulated coastal areas, both of which often now rely on tourism as the fundamental base for their economies. What makes the situation worse is the fact that initial exploration for oil would be done by oil companies instead of by the federal government—with the result that data from exploration would be secret and states would be unable to make plans based on knowledge of where the oil reserves actually are. The report recommends, with eminent good sense, that the exploration phase be left to federal agencies and that the information gathered be made public.

The other glaring deficiency in Interior's plans is that they envisage allowing the oil companies to lease millions of acres of offshore lands all in one huge gulp. The potential here is for the companies simply to sit on the reserves till the price of oil goes up. As the report points out, this is no imaginary peril in view of the fact that the companies right now are sitting on potentially productive offshore leases they earlier secured from the Interior Department. In this connection, Senator Hollings terms Interior's present leasing procedures a vehicle for a "giveaway" of the publicly-owned oil. He appears to be correct.

A number of steps need to be taken, according to the report. Leases must be of small, discrete acreages instead of great expanses of millions of acres. Interior's plans to issue the leases in 1975 must be delayed so as to give states time to plan for onshore development which otherwise could have dire social, economic and environmental impacts. And mechanisms must be established so that states can receive a full share of offshore drilling revenues, not only so they will have funds for land use and environmental planning but also to build new schools and other public facilities that will be needed with an influx of oil workers.

OIL ON THE SHORES

Friends of the nation's wetlands and beaches have reason to be grateful to Interior Secretary Rogers C. B. Morton, Mr. Morton's plans to accelerate oil drilling on the outer continental shelf have done more for the cause of coastal zone management than any thing since the Santa Barbara Channel oil spill of 1969. The coastal states have realized that their toughest problems are likely to come not from off-shore disasters but from rapid industrial development on-shore. The uncontrolled growth of refineries, petrochemical complexes and the like can ruin irreplaceable natural resources, turn placid backwater communities into unstable boom towns and overwhelm public services. Many of the Atlantic and Pacific states have started to devise controls and planning strategies to minimize the harm. But no state is really prepared to come with what may be coming, and the understandable apprehension has been magnified by Interior's apparent desire to push ahead with large-scale off-shore leasing whether the states are ready or not.

Two recent developments suggest that Interior may be shifting toward a more careful and better modulated policy. First, officials have acknowledged that they are not really counting on leasing a full 10 million acres next year, because the oil industry is not capable of undertaking such a vast program at once. Second, under pressure from California and other states, Mr. Morton last week gave the public 60 days more to study the draft environmental impact statement on the leasing program before public hearings are held. The department has not yet indicated what its modified 1975 leasing plans will be, nor how much hospitality will be given to public questions and concerns when the inevitably stormy hearings do occur. Even so, these two changes may reflect a realization that plunging ahead with grandiose plans and little regard for public opinion is the best way to provoke greater hostility, more litigation and costly delays.

The administration could take two larger steps to help the coastal states—and to strengthen the nation's overall capacity to make complex decisions about energy requirements, environmental protection and land use. First, the geological surveying required in the frontier off-shore areas should be undertaken by the U.S. Geological Survey before the oil leases are auctioned off, rather than by the oil companies afterwards. This would allow the administration to delay the lease sales without postponing the dates at which new wells might come into production. It would also greatly improve the quality of information in the public domain and enable the public, industry and all levels of government to judge more sensibly what they are dealing with off-shore. Second, the administration should make supplemental grants—some agencies have proposed a total of about $9 million—to the coastal states to accelerate their planning. This relatively small investment could have many large dividends.

No matter how open and cooperative the administration decides to be, much will turn on the attitudes of leaders in the affected states. They may, of course, assume a self-protective stance and loudly combat any oil drilling off their own shores. However popular that may seem, it would be unproductive and divisive in the extreme. It would be far wiser for state officials to acknowledge not only the nation's general need for off-shore oil, but also each region's responsibility to help meet that need. Leaders in Maryland, for instance, are taking a creative approach. Committees of the General Assembly, the state bar association and the Maryland Environmental Trust are developing innovative legislation that would require petroleum facilities to be built on sites selected and purchased by the state. In Virginia, where interest in state land-use planning has developed more slowly, 13 state agencies have recommended legislation to enlarge the role of the commonwealth in major siting decisions. Such ideas should be pursued. The oil and the refineries are needed; now is the time to start refining the controls.

OFFSHORE OIL LEASE DELAY IS SOUGHT
(By Stephen Green)

Two Maryland Republican legislators, Sen. Charles McC. Mathias and Rep. Robert E. Bauman, have moved to oppose the Ford administration's decision to grant leases for oil drilling off the shores of Maryland, Virginia and other coastal states next year.

Bauman called yesterday for Congress to act to prevent the Interior Department from granting the leases until the states have an opportunity to consider what impact the leasing and subsequent drilling would have on the coastal areas.

Mathias' office released copies of correspondence on the leasing problem between Mathias and Interior Secretary Rogers C. B. Morton, who once represented Bauman's Eastern Shore district.

Morton, replying to a letter from Mathias and other senators, said the department intended to proceed with the leasing program.

Mathias and other members of a special Senate National Oceans Policy Study Committee had written Morton last month to express "surprise and dismay" at the decision to lease 10 million acres next year for off-shore oil and gas development.

In a related development yesterday, Sen. John V. Tunney (D-Calif.), on behalf of the Senate group, issued a report calling for a delay of the leasing program until its environmental impact can be better studied and coastal management plans developed.

"It is imperative that we delay the precipitous 10 million acre leasing program developed in secrecy by the Interior Department with totally inadequate consultation with state and local officials and with complete disregard of the environmental consequences."

Bauman said he is drafting a bill that would stop Interior from leasing the offshore sites until the states develop their own coastal management plans. Several states, such as North Carolina and Delaware, have. Virginia and Maryland have not. The states would have until June 30, 1976, to come up with a plan.

"Without this legislation we'll end up plunging ahead into a development spiral which will surely degrade the environmental and esthetic qualities of our coastal areas," said Bauman.

Bauman contended Morton's attitude has amounted to a philosophy of determining the environmental impact when drilling starts. "That's ridiculous," said Bauman.

"As a former representative in Congress of a coastal district, I am sure that you recognize the impact of offshore drilling on the affected localities without prior consideration by local governments. . . . Bauman wrote Morton on Oct. 10. In the letter, he urged a delay in the leasing plan. Morton has not yet responded to the letter, Bauman said yesterday.

Bauman said he also has received no reply to an Oct. 10 letter he sent Maryland Gov. Marvin Mandel. In the letter he wrote that the Maryland legislature should enact "the necessary legislation to protect Worcester County and our beach areas in Ocean City and Assateague. I want to emphasize the urgency of action no later than next year."

Morton, in his letter to Mathias, said "I would be happy to receive any suggestion you might have for increasing our energy supply base in the next few years if we do not turn to our outer continental shelf."

In the letter Morton also said that the offshore oil would cost less to produce than the cost of importing foreign oil. However, he wrote it would sell in the United States at "world prices" with the differences "in the form of bonus payment for leases and taxes (and hence lower U.S. taxes), higher wages and reinvestable corporate profits."

COASTAL BATTLE LINES DRAWN

WASHINGTON.—Atlantic coastal states are preparing their defenses against the Ford administration's plans to accelerate oil and gas leasing on the Outer Continental Shelf in 1975.

In Virginia, the Outer Continental Shelf Advisory Committee has recommended to Gov. Mills E. Godwin that legislation be passed to protect coastal areas.

Maryland Gov. Marvin Mandel has said the state must develop a comprehensive plan to deal with the onshore impact before any drilling occurs.

Godwin has expressed concern of the impact on the rural Tidewater region, whose residents are likely to reject increased industrial development.

And the Senate's National Ocean Policy Study has commissioned a project to determine the effects of offshore drilling on the New Jersey and Delaware coasts.

In addition to the environmental effects of such drilling, the states are worried about the strain on their pocketbooks.

In Louisiana—where most of the prior OCS development has occurred in the Gulf of Mexico—the state loses about $35 million annually because of the government services it must furnish. The offshore projects bring with them substantial population increases, which mean more money is needed for such services as water, sewage, schools, police and fire protection.

The states are also concerned about the effects of construction of refineries, storage tank farms, transmission stations and facilities to build and service drilling rigs.

Substantial onshore effects can occur even from exploratory drilling, the states fear.

Maryland has received $288,000 from the federal government to develop a coastal zone management program, including determination of the Louisiana situation.

The Virginia committee has recommended legislation to strengthen the 1972 wetlands law to permit strong regional planning and zoning, provide state aid to local governments and increase state control over the location of refineries and other petroleum-related facilities.

The state of Maryland is studying the possibility of buying tracts that are well suited for petroleum facilities and requiring companies to buy such tracts for their structures.

The New Jersey-Delaware study will be conducted over the next 12 months by Brad-dock, Dunn and McDonald, Inc. of Vienna, Va.

SENATOR HOLLINGS URGES GAS RATIONING

WASHINGTON.—The chairman of a Senate study critical of administration oil policies called Tuesday for immediate gasoline rationing "to show the Arabs we mean business."

Senator Ernest F. Hollings, D-S.C., in issuing the Senate staff study, also urged a "Manhattan Project" emphasis on energy research and the opening of Naval Petroleum Reserve Number Four in Alaska to commercial oil production.

But he advised delaying off-shore oil leasing in untouched areas of the Atlantic and Pacific, charging that the Interior Department's plans to lease 10 million offshore acres in 1975 was a potential "giveaway" and "a fraud on the American public."

The Senate staff report, also critical of the Interior Department's offshore plans, urged the department to bar petroleum operations in "frontier areas" offshore unless it can prove they would be both safe and necessary.

The report suggested federal, not private, exploration of new offshore areas; nine-month studies of offshore oil impacts by the coastal states and Interior Department efforts to stimulate full development of areas already leased before new areas are opened.

FISCAL YEAR 1975 LABOR-HEW APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following correspondence between myself and Harley Dirks, professional staff member for the Appropriations Committee, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 9, 1974.

Mr. HARLEY DIRKS,
Professional Staff Member, Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor/HEW, Washington, D.C.

Dear HARLEY: As you are aware, the Senate Appropriations Committee agreed to the following Committee Report language explaining the Committee's intentions regarding federal funding for Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America (OIC):

December 19, 1974

"Similarly, the Committee directs the Department of Labor to provide not less than $15,000,000 in Title III funds under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act to Prime Sponsors on a 50-50 matching basis for the funding of Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America. The Committee, furthermore, instructs the Department of Labor to take steps to insure that funding of OIC for fiscal year 1975 be at least a total of $75 million through a combination of support by State and local sponsors and national contracts. This will provide for a total of 75,000 job opportunities. OIC presented arguments of compelling importance for these funds, and the job training and employment programs of this organization have, in the past, had an outstanding record of success."

"The Committee believes that these SER and OIC funding levels should be accomplished without reducing other on-going title III programs below the 1974 level. If, however, final agreement on the bill reached by the Congress does not provide adequate resources to make this possible, the title III matching SER and OIC earmarking language shall apply only to the extent that funds are available."

Moreover, the House Appropriations Committee also recognized the special accomplishments of OIC, by including the following language:

"The Committee is fundamentally in sympathy with the philosophy of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, which is that local needs and priorities can best be determined at the local level, and not in Washington. Nevertheless, they are concerned that manpower training programs of proven effectiveness in dealing with special groups, such as those sponsored by the OIC, SER, and Mainstream, may not receive adequate support if their future is left entirely to the discretion of local sponsors. While the Committee has refrained from earmarking specific amounts in either the bill or in this report for programs such as OIC, Mainstream, and SER, the Committee expects the Labor Department to take steps to insure that the funding of these programs is maintained at least at current levels through a combination of national contracts and support by State and local sponsors."

When the House-Senate Conference Committee considered this legislation, you will recall that you advised me that no additional explanatory language was necessary, since the specific Senate earmarking language clarified, and did not contradict, the House language. It is therefore my understanding that the Senate earmarking provision has full force as legislative history, and must be followed by the Department of Labor in administering this law. I would appreciate it, however, if you could review this legislation again, and confirm my understanding.

If you have questions, please contact my Legislative Counsel, Dave Marston (41472). Thank you very much.

Sincerely,

RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., December 16, 1974.
Hon. RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

Dear SENATOR SCHWEIKER: This letter is to confirm the intent of the House-Senate conferees, the Senate Appropriations Committee, and that of Chairman Magnuson in stating that Senate Report language accompanying the FY 1975 Labor-HEW Appropriations bill has full force as legislative history with respect to the Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America. Whenever the conference report is silent on an issue, then both House and Senate reports apply. Since the Senate report essentially concurs with the House, but further strengthens the OIC language, the Senate report must certainly be followed by the Labor Department in administering this recently signed public law. Chairman Magnuson wants me to be of assistance to you in pursuing this issue with the Department if that becomes necessary. Please let me know if there is anything further we might do.

Sincerely,

HARLEY M. DIRKS,
Professional Staff Member.

Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mr. President, I wrote to Harley Dirks to confirm my understanding of the impact of the Senate committee report language earmarking $75 million for the Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America—OIC—program. I know my colleagues are familiar with the outstanding accomplishments of OIC in the manpower training area, and of course OIC's record of success was recognized when it was included, by name, in the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act passed earlier this year. The following correspondence establishes the legislative history of the Labor-Hew appropriations bill, by making clear the intent that the Department of Labor should give the OIC program special consideration to insure it has the Federal resources to maintain its training efforts. In the present state of our economy, manpower training should be a top priority, and I believe the following correspondence makes absolutely clear our intention to insure maximum funding for OIC.

BUSING—LITTLE ROCK AND BOSTON

Mr. BIDEN, Mr. President, a columnist for the Washington Post, William Raspberry, wrote a column published December 18, 1974, which sets down clearly a difference between the objective of the early court suits against school segregation and the objective of current suits.

Mr. Raspberry at one point writes:

But the similarities between North and South over race and education have already occasioned a good deal of commentary. What goes largely unremarked are the differences between Little Rock and Boston.

To begin with, what the plaintiffs asked and what the courts ordered in Little Rock is really quite different than what was sought and achieved in Boston. Little Rock was firmly rooted in the Brown decision that said a school system may not maintain schools open only to whites or to blacks; that children—the Little Rock Nine—could not be required to attend the traditionally black high school when Central High was nearer where they lived.

The Boston plaintiffs argued, as many of the recent Northern suits have argued, that it is not enough to maintain a unitary school system, that it is also unlawful and wrong to have schools that are identifiably white or black on the basis that a large proportion of the children who attend them are of the same race.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the entire column by Mr. Raspberry be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DIFFERENCES BETWEEN LITTLE ROCK AND BOSTON

(By William Raspberry)

Those who thought the North was different must be astonished at the similarities between what went on in the Deep South two decades ago and what is going on in Boston today.

There on each evening's television news is the open, curled-lip hatred, the vicious race baiting, the bitter defiance of the law, the demagoguery, the venomous racial epithets—all the old familiar themes from the South of 20 years ago.

There are also the demonstrations, the marches, the chants, the strong-willed determination to follow through on a chosen course even at the risk of jail—all the old familiar trappings of the black movement.

It looks like Little Rock gone North. But the similarities between North and South over race and education have already occasioned a good deal of commentary. What goes largely unremarked are the differences between Little Rock and Boston.

To begin with, what the plaintiffs asked and what the courts ordered in Little Rock is really quite different than what was sought and achieved in Boston. Little Rock was firmly rooted in the Brown decision that said a school system may not maintain schools open only to whites or to blacks; that children—the Little Rock Nine—could not be required to attend the traditionally black high school when Central High was nearer where they lived.

The Boston plaintiffs argued, as many of the recent Northern suits have argued, that it is not enough, to maintain a unitary school system, that it is also unlawful and wrong to have schools that are identifiably white or black on the basis that a large proportion of the children who attend them are of the same race.

The two notions are really quite different, even though they are both termed "desegregation."

An analogy to black and white neighborhoods makes the point. The principle of the Brown decision applied to housing would hold that no person could lawfully be denied access to housing he could afford on the basis of his race. It is a principle widely endorsed, even though it is obvious that racial steering, sub rosa agreements and plain lying still are used to keep black people from moving into "white" neighborhoods. At least occasionally, people get caught and brought to justice for these racist efforts.

The point here is while neighborhood segregation and public school segregation are very much of a piece, springing from the same sources, no one has seriously proposed for neighborhoods the same second step that is commonly demanded for schools: integration by any feasible means.

We count desegregation as accomplished when it is possible for blacks to buy or rent anywhere their money will let them, and if some neighborhoods remain identifiably white or black (as some Washington neighborhoods clearly are) no one alleges racial segregation.

But with schools, the prevailing view is that it isn't enough to stop setting aside schools for white and black pupils; the school must be integrated. If assignment by home address does not result in integrated schools, then other means must be employed to achieve that result.

If someone made a similar proposal for ending racially identifiable neighborhoods, he'd be carted off to the looney bin.

It's one thing to take a real estate operator's license, or even to send to jail, for refusing to show black home-seekers houses in "white" neighborhoods. It is another to hold Wesley Heights out of compliance until more black families can be brought to live there, whether they particularly want to or not.

There is another interesting difference between Little Rock and Boston. In Little Rock, it was clear what the black plaintiffs were after. Central and the other white schools had better facilities, more resources and better educational programs than the neglected black schools.

But it is hard to see what anybody hopes to gain by busing his children into South Boston High. If Southie is significantly better off than Roxbury—culturally, economically or educationally—it isn't very obvious to me. The area apparently has a highly developed sense of community, but that doesn't seem to be what Boston blacks are after.

The only thing South Boston has in obvious abundance is whiteness, and someone seems to have decided that proximity to whiteness is in and of itself a worthy goal for black people. I missed the meeting when they explained why.

Boston, it must be emphasized, did not wind up with its black residents concentrated in certain neighborhoods, and in certain schools, by accident. The evidence is that decisions on where to locate new schools and where to draw attendance boundaries, among others, have been made in ways calculated to minimize racial integration.

It may that these racist actions should be punished. But it is hard to see how using black children as instruments of that punishment does very much for the children. Or for anyone else.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL AND THE POSTAL RATE CONTROVERSY

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, on May 9 this year, the Senate debated and approved S. 411, a bill to increase the time interval which users of certain classes of mail would have to adjust to higher postal rates. The bill was later signed as Public Law 93-328.

During the Senate debate, divergent views were expressed as to whether the publishing industry, and especially certain publications, needed the additional subsidies provided in the legislation to remain financially healthy. I opposed the increase in such postal subsidies, citing among other evidence, data furnished me by the U.S. Postal Service showing the amount of such subsidies being received by certain magazines and newspapers. In remarks on the Senate floor, I said:

Information given me by the U.S. Postal Service shows that the Readers Digest magazine, under present law—if we do nothing with this bill—will receive a subsidy of $19,452,000 for its postal rates. Under S. 411, its subsidy will increase by $12,545,000 for a total subsidy of $31,997,000 for the 16-year period covered by this legislation.

Time magazine, under present law, will receive $17,901,000. Under S. 411 it will receive an additional $11,826,000 for a total of $29,727,000 over the same 16-year period.

How can we justify, Mr. President, giving $29,727,000 of the taxpayers' money to a company that receives a return of 12.5 percent on its equity?

The Wall Street Journal, under present law, will receive a subsidy of $23,373,000. S. 411 would increase this subsidy by $15,339,000, for a total of $38,712,000 over the 16-year period in S. 411, and the Wall Street Journal is doing well though I do not have the return on equity for this company.

Subsequently, the Dow Jones & Co., Inc., which publishes the Wall Street Journal, took issue with the information furnished by the Postal Service. I requested Dow Jones to submit its views in writing to me, which it did. I then submitted the Dow Jones views to the Postal Service for comment, which I have now received.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the views of Dow Jones & Co. and the comments by the Postal Service.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL AND THE POSTAL RATE CONTROVERSY

In the debates concerning second-class postal rates, it is often charged that major publications such as The Wall Street Journal are not paying their way and are getting a free ride at the expense of the taxpayer. (For example, see debates in Congressional Record on May 9, 1974 concerning S411, beginning on page 14050 through 14087.) This is a false allegation. It can be shown to be false by analysis of the Postal Service's own figures.

(Detailed documentation is contained in the testimony of economist Charles W. King before the Postal Rate Commission—dated May 16, 1974, Docket No. R74-1. Much of the following is drawn in summary form from that testimony.)

The Postal Service has been quoted (by Senator Fong, page 14055 of May 9, 1974 Congressional Record) as saying second-class mailers as a group pay a "cost coverage of 129.5% (of attributable costs), which is 65% of the actual cost." It is arguable whether the 65% cost coverage estimate for second-class mail is valid, but let's assume for the sake of this discussion that it is. It is not valid, however, to imply that the cost coverage figure applicable to the entire second-class group is the same figure applicable to any individual member of the group—particularly one such as The Wall Street Journal, which does so much of its own pre-sorting and transportation of mail. A dollar subsidy figure for an individual mailer such as the Journal certainly cannot be derived from using this percentage figure.

The Postal Service uses a system of costing which attributes about half of the cost of the postal system to the various classes of mail services. The remaining half are called "institutional" or "non-attributable" and are costs allegedly shared by all mail users. However, it is a fact that all classes of mail do not participate equally in the institutional cost of the postal system. Second-class bulk shipments are deposited at the larger post offices. We do not incur mail collection route costs, cost of third- and fourth-class post offices or smaller branch stations, or window services costs at the post offices, to cite just a few examples.

Discussion of second-class mail costs obscures the very much lower costs and higher revenues of daily newspapers within that class. Consider the following:

FISCAL YEAR 1972 PER PIECE COSTS AND REVENUES

	Daily newspapers	Other publications	Total 2d class
Attributable cost (cents).....	2.516	5.308	4.548
Revenues (cents).....	2.806	2.615	2.694
Revenue coverage of attributable cost (percent).....	115	49	59

FISCAL YEAR 1975 PER PIECE COSTS AND REVENUES

	Daily newspapers	Other publications	Total 2d class
Attributable cost (cents).....	3.131	6.872	5.759
Revenues (cents).....	5.7	5.1	5.3
Revenue coverage of attributable cost (percent).....	184	74	91
1975 revenue coverage of costs under the proposed rates now being considered by the Postal Rate Commission (percent).....	252	103	126

Under the proposed rates, daily newspapers would make a contribution to institutional costs greater proportionately than for any other major class of mail.

The above figures are based on the Postal Service's own data, supplied by postal executives Arthur Eden and Harold Orenstein in testimony, exhibits and answers to interrogatories in connection with the current Postal Rate Commission hearings. (Including, for fiscal 1972 cost and revenue data, Eden answer to interrogatory no. 35 by Direct Mail/Marketing Association, May 10, 1974; and Eden testimony, Exhibit 5, page 4 and Exhibit 4, page 4; and for fiscal 1975 cost data, worksheets supporting Orenstein Exhibit 2, Part D, R-1, and testimony of Orenstein, Table 3; and for fiscal 1975 revenue data under current and proposed rates, Orenstein Exhibits 2 and 3.) The detailed analysis is contained in the Charles W. King testimony particularly pages 11, 13 and 14, with amplification in answers to related interrogatories.

The Wall Street Journal costs much less to handle than daily newspapers as a group. A Postal Service study conducted in 1972—Rate Classification Study Number 9: Red Tag Service for Publications Mail—showed the processing of publications such as The Journal that have received maximum mail preparation costs the Postal Service approximately one-fourth the cost of publications mail with minimum make-up and preparation. (The Postal Service has rejected repeated requests to make this study public. It contends it was "aborted," it is "fragmentary" and "incomplete." It has commissioned a new Red Tag Mail study instead.)

Mr. King's testimony documents Wall Street Journal cost savings for the Postal Service in detail. A few examples: Because the Journal pre-sorts its mail by zip codes and sometimes even by individual carrier routes, it requires an average of 2.0 sorting handlings compared with 5 for unsorted mail. Because the Journal transports its mail to central post offices closer to subscribers, it requires less than 11 bundle handlings compared with an average of 23 for others. Because the Journal sends its papers out in flat bundles instead of mail sacks, it saves the Postal Service millions of dollars by eliminating the need for more than 5 million sacks and by requiring much less space in truck trailers than sacks would occupy, thus requiring the use of fewer vehicles than the equivalent amount of sacked publications mail or letter mail. The transportation savings is about 25 percent.

Under the proposed rates with the S411 phasing for the year 1975, The Wall Street Journal contributes a minimum of $2.8 million a year above and beyond its attributable cost. This figure is derived from the Postal Service's figures for all daily newspapers. But because the Journal costs much less to handle than the daily newspaper group, its contribution above and beyond its attributable cost obviously is well above $2.8 million. If there were no phasing, it would contribute more than $11 million a year above its attributable costs (again based conservatively on the statistics for daily newspapers generally). Details of these calculations are contained in the aforementioned King testimony.

VI

Well-known, prosperous publications such as The Wall Street Journal are highly visible and from a political standpoint make appealing targets to justify ever-higher rates to cover the Postal Service cost until it establishes the economic and efficient management contemplated by the Postal Reorganization Act. But the facts are that we more than cover our costs.

Let subsidies to smaller marginal publications that cannot afford the pre-sorting and other mail preparation of large mailers be judged separately on their merits and in light of historical policy. Let other publishers being serviced under an efficient and economically managed Postal Service be charged according to the cost of servicing their publications.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL AND THE POSTAL RATE CONTROVERSY POSTAL SERVICE COMMENTS

PART I

The Postal Service has not said The Wall Street Journal "gets a free ride." We have supplied data, on request from Members of Congress, to illustrate how much of "revenue foregone" benefits various publications receive from phased rates and how much more of such benefits they would receive under various bills, such as S. 411. The data was computed by subtracting the phased rate actually paid by the publishers by virtue of the statutory subsidy accorded them, from the full rates they would pay absent phasing and multiplying that difference by the publication's volume. This amount is an actual dollar subsidy that reduces the postage that the Wall Street Journal would be required to pay under the existing classification schedule.

The Wall Street Journal seems to be arguing that the costs to the Postal Service for handling the Journal are less than the average for second class publications and therefore they should be accorded a separate rate rather than being lumped in with other publications. If later studies establish that the Journal and perhaps some other publications are unique in the area of cost causality, the subject of a new subclass recognizing the distinctions may be properly considered in Phase II or III of the current classification proceedings before the Postal Rate Commission. The impracticality of establishing a separate rate category for each publisher who says the costs to the Postal Service for handling his publication are different from the average costs of the class is self-evident.

PART II

The discussion under this part assumes that causality is a factor in apportioning institutional costs to classes of mail. Such is not the case. The Postal Service spreads these costs via a pricing markup based on each class' elasticity of demand.

PART III

The Postal Service reports unit costs for newspapers lower than costs for other second-class mail. But under the present classification system separate rates cannot be established for newspapers and magazines. If there is any merit in separate rates, the matter must be addressed in Phase II or III of the classification proceeding and not in the present rate case. Mr. King, the Dow Jones witness, has agreed.

PART IV

The Postal Service did not release the partially completed study on time value second class mail because management felt the analysis was inadequate and would not accept responsibility for nor sponsor the study. There is a new study nearing completion.

PART V

The comments assert the Journal's phased rates in FY '75 exceeded average attributable costs for newspapers as a whole by $2.8 million. They further indicate at full rates the equivalent contribution in excess of attributable costs would be $11 million. This would appear to be confirmation that the Journal will receive a fiscal 1975 tax supported subsidy of at least $8.2 million.

RESOLUTION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, on December 9 and 10, the Executive Committee of the Trilateral Commission held its third meeting in Washington. The Commission is a nongovernmental organization of Europeans, North Americans, and Japanese designed to enhance mutual understanding in these three great regions of the industrialized free world and to seek common solutions to common problems. The Trilateral Commission has been especially concerned with energy, trade, and international monetary problems and has sponsored a number of projects and papers to elucidate these problems and find solutions.

At its Washington meeting, the Executive Committee of the Commission adopted a resolution reflecting its concern over the dangers posed by worldwide inflation and the abrupt changes in oil prices. In order to meet the urgent challenge of the accumulation of funds by the OPEC countries, the executive committee resolution suggests that the industrialized countries approach OPEC with a cooperative proposal to recycle petrodollars, provide new sources of investment capital, and share the burden of foreign assistance. The resolution also endorses the efforts of the United States, Japan, and some European countries to cooperate on energy problems through the International Energy Agency and urges other oil-consuming countries to join this effort.

Because the resolution will be of interest to Congress, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION

The international system is undergoing a drastic transformation through a number of crises. Worldwide inflation reflects, transmits and magnifies the tensions of many societies, while the difficulties produced by the abrupt change in oil prices are accompanied by the entry of major new participants onto the world scene.

Confrontation in an attempt to maintain the underlying assumptions of the old system could lead to a general breakdown. On the other hand, creative policies to adapt it to the new partners and conditions could extend the area of effective cooperation more widely than ever before.

Such cooperation must be based on the principle of equality. This is the core of any future political understanding.

This applies notably to the most urgent challenge, the one posed by the funds being accumulated by the oil producers. These could dislocate the system if they are not properly absorbed. Cooperatively used, on the other hand, they are a potentially massive new source of investment in a world which will be in desperate need of capital.

In view of the proposals which have been put forward for cooperation between the oil consuming countries, and the need for cooperation also with the oil producers, the Executive Committee of the Trilateral Commission calls on the major oil consuming countries to approach the OPEC countries in order to find out if they would consider:

Setting up a new Bank for Fund Recycling, with subscription of an equal amount of capital and joint control by oil consumers and producers.

Such parity is essential to create confidence and stability, enabling the bank to borrow funds from the OPEC countries on an acceptable debt instrument.

Creating a new international agency associated with the World Bank to supply the extra $3 billion a year urgently required by the most needy developing countries. This agency should borrow $3 billion a year at 8% interest from OPEC countries and lend it to low income countries at 3%, in loans with 20-year maturities and four-year grace periods, in each of the years 1976-1980. The total cost of the interest subsidy required for these loans would amount to $900 million a year for the years 1976-1980, a sum small enough so that it should be politically feasible to raise it among the OECD and OPEC countries.

These short term solutions are complementary to the need simultaneously to develop a longer term framework for international cooperation. The Executive Committee believes that this should involve a tripartite global structure in which the oil producers are encouraged to invest in low income areas by joint guarantees with the highly industrialized countries. To prepare the necessary long term framework for cooperation, a tripartite conference, or series of conferences, should be organized, involving some of the highly industrialized countries from each of the three trilateral regions, some of the oil producers and some of the low income countries.

The solidity of the long term framework also requires that the major oil consuming countries cooperate on energy policies.

The Executive Committee welcomes the agreement on an International Energy Agency able to organize crisis cooperation and hopes that other countries of their regions will join the group.

It also endorses the recommendations for joint action contained in the report on "Energy: A Strategy for International Action" submitted to it and particularly the proposals for (i) the reduction of dependence on imports, (ii) holding the annual growth of energy consumption below 2% in North America, 3% in Europe and 4% in Japan, and (iii) cooperation in developing the extensive energy reserves, actual or potential, of the trilateral area.

The success of measures to rejuvenate the international economic system are umbilically tied to successful progress towards a lasting peace in the Middle East. Such a peace settlement must be guaranteed by the United States and the Soviet Union; other countries, especially the European states, should be ready, if required, to associate themselves with them.

The Executive Committee has discussed means by which the Trilateral Commission could in future further the proposals in this resolution. Also, it has initiated a trilateral policy program on a Renovated International System, to be completed by 1976.

The Commission will hold its first Plenary Session in Tokyo in May 1975.

U.S. ABSTENTION AT THE U.N.
GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I was puzzled and disappointed that the United States abstained when the U.N. General Assembly recently approved, 126 to 0, the resolution, with an accompanying draft convention, for prohibiting environmental warfare and referred it to the Conference of the Committee on Disarmament—CCD—in Geneva for further action. By abstaining, the United States found itself in the odd assorted company of France, Chile, Mali, and Paraguay.

The draft convention, or treaty, of the U.N. resolution was very similar to the draft treaty unanimously approved by the North Atlantic Assembly in November 1972 and recommended by this Senate, 82 to 10, as part of Senate Resolution 71 in July 1973. That resolution bade the United States "seek agreement of other governments to a proposed treaty prohibiting the use of any environmental or geophysical modification activity as a weapon of war." Both the United Nations and the Senate resolutions clearly call for this prohibition to be incorporated into a formal international agreement.

Why, then, should the United States abstain on a project which the Senate in a strong mandate had asked the administration itself to undertake a year and a half ago?

The explanation of the administration is that it objected to the prohibition being reduced to a convention or any kind of formal agreement—that the whole concept should be left open as in the words of the United States-Soviet Summit Understanding of July 3, in which the two countries "Advocate the most effective measures possible to overcome the dangers of the use of environmental modification techniques for military purposes." In taking this position, however, the administration was ignoring the Senate mandate calling for a treaty.

I fear that one reason for the administration's action was pique. It was the Soviet Union that took the initiative to introduce into the General Assembly a proposed resolution and draft convention, which in final passage included Swedish revisions intended to meet U.S. objections. This Soviet move, whatever its motive, put the administration's nose out of joint on the grounds that there had not been adequate prior consultation in the spirit of the earlier Summit Understanding.

As a Senator, my sympathy with the administration's irritation is limited by the fact that the United States had over a year to do what the Soviets finally did. The situation would not have arisen if the administration had responded with greater alacrity to Senate Resolution 71. An uncharitable interpretation is that, reflecting Pentagon reluctance to the whole concept, the U.S. motivation for the vague language of the summit understanding was deliberately to delay the ban on military use of environmental modification from reaching the treaty stage and thus foreclosing a future military option.

We should not, however, dwell further on a post mortem of the past. Regardless of the circumstances of how it came about, the positive, encouraging development is that the proposal for a ban on environmental warfare has reached an international forum, the CCD in Geneva, for consideration in the spring.

What is essential now is that the United States give its wholehearted backing at the CCD and elsewhere for bringing into force at an early date, a treaty to prevent the military use of environmental or geophysical modification. I have written to the Secretaries of State and Defense urging their full support in this effort.

That objective reflects the will of the Senate expressed in Senate Resolution 71 passed a year and a half ago. It is an objective that will serve the long-range security interests of the United States and contribute to lasting world peace.

STATE CONSUMER ACTION
PROGRAM

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, recently, Ralph Nader gave a speech to the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders in which he outlined a bold State consumer action program worthy of their consideration. I have reviewed Nader's proposals and believe that there are a number of recommendations which could form the foundation for an excellent program for State legislators concerned with the proper functioning of the marketplace. Additionally, there are some concepts which should be translated into Federal legislation which I intend to study for use in the 94th Congress.

Mr. President, the Nader talk should be closely read by both Federal and State legislators. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the text of the Nader speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY RALPH NADER BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATIVE LEADERS, NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 9, 1974

As lawmaking bodies, state legislatures could be entering a period of major awakening after years of easy manipulation by special interest groups and their executive branch's indentured servants. It is not a uniform awakening. Nor is it principally prodded from within but rather is receiving the winds of change from outside citizen groups and the accumulated sweep of the public's distaste over current conditions and recurrent corruption in government.

The building of the state legislature's capacity to conduct its duties is one of the first orders of business. Developing competent professional staff and resources with which to initiate and complete its responsibilities of legislation, oversight and the facilitating of citizen access to itself and to the other two branches of government—executive and judicial—is of central importance. No longer can the almost contrived inability of the legislature to do more than reverberate—puppet-like—to executive branch orders be tolerated as was the case for so many years under the Rockefeller regime in Albany. The procedural reforms of open meetings, conflicts of interest avoidance, campaign finance cleanup and decentralized legislative initiatives within the legislature itself are only the beginnings of the need to be meticulous in the implementation of the public interest. Legislatures for sale or for rent are the foremost felony of the land for it is here that the crux of democracy is so fundamentally and consequentially destroyed.

Many of the problems before you in the coming years are not difficult to grasp—like the serious and undimissable contamination of many local antiquated drinking water systems by polluted sources. Nor are many solutions out of reach—like the need for self-help systems as consumer class actions, advocacy and checkoff proposals for consumers and rigorous investigation by legislative committees of government agencies and departments that waste, flout and violate revenues and laws. They are stayed by cowardice, sloth, venality or abdication.

There will be an increasing resort by citizen movements to activate the initiative, referendum and recall in states that have them and push for their adoption in states which escaped the early populist-progressive movements at the turn of the century. For the most significant movement in America today, little recognized by the media, is the citizens' movement for tax, environmental and consumer reforms, for greater self-determined citizen access rights vis-à-vis government and for ever more and more fundamental inquiries and assessments of the political and economic institutions which have so long dominated the society that is now in so much trouble. The wholesale delegation of the people's power to these over-concentrating institutions in business and government has reached its most extreme lengths. The reclaiming of these powers by more direct democracy, more direct involvement of citizens in shaping their own future, is the meaning of the transformation of disgruntlement into sustained civic actions.

As legislative leaders, you can help lead this movement or you will be overtaken by it. Repeated crisis will cause change as much as the sharpened perception and stamina of citizen movements. The depression of leadership is evident and will continue until elected politicians work closely their citizen constituency between elections to resolve or prevent the problems, abuses and injustices which the legislative power is invested to accomplish. It is well to appreciate that it is not just what the legislature can do directly but also what it can put into motion throughout the government and society. In today's intricate and interdependent society, proper restraints and meaningful freedoms go hand in hand. It is your function to provide educational leadership for people to recognize this twin function of the law.

What follows is a platform of legislative suggestions for the immediate future with several references for follow-up.

I. INCREASE IN DIRECT CITIZEN INVOLVEMENT IN GOVERNMENT AND REFORM

Initiative. For democracy to be real, citizens must have timely and accurate information about the processes of government; they must also feel that there are officials and elected representatives who will listen and respond to their needs. Most importantly, they must have vehicles available to them for redress and action if they are unable to find responsive governmental leaders or bureaucrats.

One such vehicle which has been effective in California is the Initiative. Under the Initiative procedure this year California voters passed Proposition 9, the political reform act providing conflicts of interest by public officials, regulation of lobbyists and other "clean government" reforms.

Of the 50 states, 22 have a statewide initiative; 25 states have a statewide referendum (the process by which voters may repeal or approve a bill passed by a state legislature); and 14 states have a statewide recall. The other states should move immediately to provide for a process by which a prescribed number of people may petition for submission of proposed laws directly to the voters. Over half a million Californians signed the petition that placed Proposition 9 on the ballot.

Such direct democratic measures were largely passed during the Populist-Progressive period of American history early in this century. But they have been dormant in most states, unused and forgotten by most citizens. They should be revived as a major way to restore confidence in legitimate government.

The revival of the initiative, referendum and recall in states which provide for them, and the passage of similar measures in other states would reduce citizen apathy and quicken citizens involvement in public policy. It is the restoration of excessive delegation of power from the people back to the people—American style. Further details can be obtained from the newly-published National Initiative And Vote of Confidence (Tool for Self-Government) by Ed and Joyce Koupal. This is available from People's Lobby, 3456 W. Olympic Blvd., Los Angeles, Calif. 90019. The cost is $5.00.

Class Actions. One of the most important ways in which citizens can help themselves is through the expansion of the concept of the class action. In a number of recent decisions, the United States Supreme Court has significantly cut back on the ability of consumers to bring class actions in the federal courts. Thus, except where a special statute is involved, such as the antitrust or securities laws, each person who claims an injury must allege a loss of $10,000 or more in order to be a member of the class. Even then, where monetary damages are sought, the Court has ruled that individual notices—paid for by the named plaintiffs—must be sent to each member of the class who can reasonably be identified. And entry to the federal courts is not even available for a single plaintiff, let alone a class, unless there is either a violation of federal law or the dispute is between citizens of different states.

Thus, it is clear that class actions need a boost from the states which are free to enact statutes and pass rules designed to foster rather than deter class actions. Contrary to the myth which is circulated by the giants who are the principal potential defendants in class actions, a recent study by Georgetown Law School, in conjunction with the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee, demonstrates that class actions are not overwhelming the federal courts and that they are generally not serving as vehicles for abusing the processes of justice while enriching only the plaintiffs' lawyer. The way in which large scale civil wrongdoing is going to be widely deterred is by making available the class action remedy so that those who violate the law on a wholesale basis will not get a 90% discount when it comes time to pay for their wrongs.

Among the options which should be considered are (1) public financing of notice to class members where notice is appropriate or required by law; (2) statutorily providing that where either the damage to each class member is small or the members of the class can be reimbursed only with great difficulty or at great expense, the wrongdoers shall nonetheless be liable for the full amount of damages, and the court directed to apply them to an appropriate group or purpose; and (3) specifically assuring that under laws providing for minimum statutory damages, class actions may be maintained, contrary to the holdings in a number of cases involving the Truth in Lending Act.

The road to progress in the federal system is rocky indeed. The rules of procedure can only be changed by the Supreme Court, which is not inclined to do so, and in most cases the relevant statutes must advance through the Senate Judiciary Committee where Senator James Eastland is carefully guarding the door against justice. The states can and should take the lead, as California has already done in part, because otherwise significant progress in the new term is unlikely.

Standing and Attorneys fees. Legislatures can pass laws, but it is the courts which must stand behind them if they are to be enforced. Normally, one would look to the executive branch of government to insist upon that enforcement, but when it is the executive which is breaking the law, "who will guard the guards?" Reference here is not made to criminal violations a la Watergate but to routine violations of statutes enacted to protect consumers, taxpayers and just plain ordinary citizens, violations committed by the persons sworn to uphold those very laws.

The remedy, of course, is to allow suits by the affected citizens, taxpayers, etc. The problem is that the courts have erected a pernicious barrier known in legalese as the law of standing, but in practical terms means "Don't mind our business." The federal courts, under the lead of Chief Justice Burger, have been taking significant steps backwards in recent years and hence many violations by the Executive branch are unremedied. The situation is somewhat different in the states where either by statute or by decision, taxpayers often are able to bring suits forbidden in the federal courts. But even in those states where taxpayers have standing, other interested groups do not, unless they can meet the often rigorous tests of demonstrating "injury" of the kind the courts feel is proper—which usually means monetary harm.

All of this can easily be changed by statute, as even the Supreme Court seems to have conceded for the federal courts. At the very least any member of the legislature who believes that an official in the executive branch is violating the law should be able to take that person to court and have a judge rather than the wrongdoer decide whether the law has been violated. Even better, any citizen or taxpayer who is wronged should have that right, conditional only upon a prior request to the official to correct his action before suit can be started. This latter approach has been adopted in a number of recent federal laws dealing with the environment and has enabled interested persons to insure compliance with the law without unnecessary delay in litigating issues of standing.

In this connection, another important element of that same group of recent federal statutes is the inclusion of a provision for attorneys fees for citizens' suits. If private attorneys are to take up public causes, it is unrealistic to expect them to do so unless there is some hope that they will earn some recompense. There are simply too few public interest lawyers to take the cases that should be brought to do the job without the participation of the private bar. One other matter on attorneys fees is essential: the rate to be allowed must be the prevailing rate for all attorneys in the locale. Otherwise, the wrongdoers will reap a windfall where a public interest organization provides the legal assistance.

Freedom of Information. By an overwhelming vote of 371 to 32 in the House and 65 to 27 in the Senate, Congress on November 20, 1974, overrode President Ford's veto of badly needed amendments to the Freedom of Information Act as originally passed in 1967. In doing so, it recognized that the existing law, because of several loopholes amenable to abuse by judicial decisions and bureaucratic manipulation, was inadequate for effectively providing vitally needed public access to government documents and decision-making process on the federal level.

It is equally important that the public be informed about the state decision-making process which has a substantial impact on their daily lives. Only through the implementation of strong freedom of information and public meeting (or sunshine) laws on state levels will citizens have access to the information necessary to fulfill their responsibility to participate fully and effectively in the political process. Information is the currency of democracy.

It is imperative that state freedom of information laws be enacted, amended or superseded, whichever is appropriate, that will (a) apply to both the executive and legislative branches; (b) apply to all documents in the possession of the government and not only to those required by law to be kept; (c) provide procedural tools that will prevent bureaucratic abuses based on delay and cost (such as time limits for responding to requests for information); administrative penalty sanctions to be applied to employees who arbitrarily withhold information from the public, attorney fees for successful plaintiffs and limit the costs of access to the actual cost of copying and research; (d) provide citizens a right to judicial relief; (e) provide for broad court review power and authorize the courts to order disclosure of public records; and (f) have any exemptions be fairly specific and well-defined which will avoid some of the loopholes of the more general and broadly defined ones.

The state of Texas has recently enacted a freedom of information law and Florida has a sunshine law that are both particularly good examples of strong and stringent public access statutes that should be looked to for examples in drafting similar legislation.

Finally, it is essential that an independent state body be given the responsibility to oversee the operation of the public access laws and to ensure their proper implementation. In addition, this body should serve as a pre-judicial forum in which citizens could petition to obtain release of documents that an agency has refused to release.

Employee Responsibility. The United States became a nation with the conviction that arbitrary government action should not restrict the freedom of individuals to follow their own consciences. Today arbitrary treatment of citizens by powerful institutions has assumed a new form, no less insidious than that which precipitated the American Revolution. Within the structure of the "organization"—be it corporate or governmental—there has taken place an erosion of both human values and the broader value of human beings as the possibility of dissent within the hierarchy has become so restricted that common candor requires uncommon courage.

The key question is, at what point should an employee resolve that allegiance to society (e.g., the public safety) must supercede allegiance to an organization's unlawful, corrupt or wasteful policies, and then act on that resolve by informing outsiders or legal authorities? It is clear that hundreds and often thousands of people are privy to such information, but choose to remain silent within their organization. There is, therefore, a great need to develop an articulate ethic of whistle blowing which can be practically applied in many contexts, especially within corporate and governmental bureaucracies.

All areas of the law touching upon the employer-employee relationship should be reexamined with an eye to modifying substantially the old rule that an employer can discharge an employee for acts of conscience without regard to the damage done the employee. Existing laws that regulate industries should be modified to include provisions protecting employees who cooperate with authorities. Government employees should be treated like public servants if they are expected to act like them. Today, civil service laws and regulations serve two primary functions, each the exact opposite of those initially intended. First, they tend to reward or at least shield incompetence and sloth. Second, they discourage creativity and diligence. You might say that the speed of exit of a public servant is almost directly proportional to his or her commitment to serve the public.

State as well as federal legislation should insure that employees have legal protection when they point out that citizen health and safety has given way to profit, greed and inefficiency.

For further consideration of this issue see Whistle Blowing edited by Blackwell, Nader and Petkas (Grossman Publishers, 1972) and the forthcoming Spoiled System by Robert Vaughn (Charterhouse).

II. POLITICAL REFORM

To further insure the involvement of the citizenry and to restore faith in the processes of government, numerous political reforms are needed throughout state laws.

Open Government. Especially after Watergate, citizens and officials alike appreciate Brandeis' wisdom that "sunlight is the best of disinfectants." The way to discourage official sloth and skulduggery, the way to hold officials accountable to the people is to throw some sunlight on operations previously kept confidential. It is a perversion in a democracy for those who do the people's business to keep the people in the dark.

After much prodding, the Federal Government came to understand this principle in 1967, when the Freedom of Information Act became law.

Beyond freedom of information, a number of measures are valuable additions to open government:

(a) Those who are paid to lobby state legislatures and state agencies should be required (under consolidated forms) to list their names, group affiliations, the subject of their interest and what they are spending in pursuit of it. Further, when someone lobbies a state agency once a formal proceeding is underway or once an investigation toward a civil law enforcement action has begun, he or she should be required to log the fact and purpose of that visit on some public calendar. These requirements in no way violate the intent of the First Amendment, which aimed to encourage citizens to petition their government. It instead strengthens the First Amendment by furthering its founding premise—a competition of ideas and factions in the political marketplace. When some citizens reveal, often through an investigative process, what they are up to, this revelation can alert and inspire other citizens to mobilize to fight for their interests; they can visit those whom their opponents have visited; they can gauge the importance of seemingly minor measures by the amount that business is spending to defeat or promote. In all, these rules encourage the kind of political contests that are the trademark of a working democracy.

(b) Public officials must disclose their financial interests as a way to discourage self-dealing and corruption. Conflicts-of-interest can be more widespread locally than federally. From the alcoholic beverage businessman on a liquor board to a lieutenant governor garnering large legal fees, the temptation for economic self-help at the local and state level can overwhelm those who care more for their purse than the public. But a strict disclosure law can help insure that officials will take positions which, when matched against their personal economic benefits, they can publicly defend. If this principle is strictly applied to, say, an Undersecretary of Defense and a Vice-President, it should be no less necessary for honest government to apply it to a Health Services Commissioner, a State Highway Commissioner, or the Agriculture Department chief.

Campaign Reform. Proposition 9, recently passed by initiative in California, can act as a guide for reform of the elective and governmental process in all other states that either have not enacted any reform or have enacted weaker reforms.

The key provisions of the new law are as follows:

1. Campaign receipts and expenditures—strict filing requirements for all committees and candidates.

2. Creation of a strong regulatory body removed from partisan politics that will enforce the provisions of the law.

3. Campaign spending limits—depending on population, geographic size and media markets.

4. Conflict of Interest—complete disclosure by all elected and appointed officials, or at least disclosure where there will be a potential conflict of interest.

5. Regulation of the activities of lobbyists and limitations on their abilities to finance campaigns.

Passage of political and campaign reforms are the acid test of legislative sincerity to remove the barriers to democracy in this country. Cynicism will prevail unless there is reform. Many legislators as well as political parties who continue to abuse the public's right to know will suffer political defeat by an aware public if the recent past is any guide.

Ombudsman. Another vehicle for reforming the governmental process is the creation of an Office of Ombudsman, whose main function is to handle citizen complaints against the government, without charge to the citizen, and to see that the law is properly administered. Without enforcement powers, the Ombudsman uses persuasive methods including reports to the legislature for reform and the media to bring about corrective actions. The ideal Ombudsman would be a high level official of the legislature with adequate funding and status, independent of the bodies overseen, with long tenure in the office.

In July 1969, Hawaii became the first state to appoint an Ombudsman. The office received $103,000 and wide authority to investigate the internal activities of state agencies and to intervene in administrative matters. Also, there are provisions to insure that the person appointed will not be easily tossed out if he becomes too effective. The Ombudsman is appointed by a majority vote of no less than two thirds of each house, and only for neglect of duty, misconduct, or disability.

Some successes for the Hawaii Ombudsman—

Inmates at the Hawaii State Prison now have the right to file grievances with prison authorities.

The Department of Regulatory Agencies now send a letter of explanation along with all dismissed complaints.

Interest is now paid on rental security deposits for leased space at the airports.

The Contract License Board requires most home improvement contractors to enter into written contracts with consumers.

Citizens in Hawaii now see their complaints against the governmental agencies reviewed and handled by an independent body without any direct charge to them. Agencies are aware that someone is monitoring their behavior, and the public thereby has greater access to the decision makers.

It is certainly an improvement over the present ad hoc manner of handling citizen problems by government agencies in most states, if those problems are handled at all.

III. ENERGY AND ENVIRONMENTAL ACTIONS

Nuclear Safety And Reliability. After two decades of assurances by the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) and private utilities that nuclear power is acceptably safe, the evidence to the contrary has become undeniably impressive during the last several years. As the true range of risks emerges from behind the massive curtain of secrecy long surrounding matters dealing with nuclear energy, Americans are becoming involved and informed.

Not only are they becoming involved and informed but they are taking action; they have demanded an AEC review of the Emergency Core Cooling System; they demanded a reassessment of the reliance on nuclear power to end the energy crisis; and in a conference held November 15-17, 1974 in Washington, D.C. citizen groups from 40 states demanded a moratorium on the building of new nuclear power plants.

Although the Supreme Court has ruled that the states are preempted from establishing standards for nuclear pollution, there are avenues for action. There is a wide area for creative legislation. Laws requiring utilities to demonstrate that capital expansion plans will not jeopardize their economic stability could have the effect of limiting nuclear proliferation. Similarly, laws requiring utilities to demonstrate that there is an assured fuel supply, adequate insurance or that a facility will have a minimum reliability factor, could have the same effect. Zoning, land use and facility siting laws can also provide a lever over nuclear power plant construction.

A caveat to bear in mind in pursuing any of these approaches is that they must be carefully drafted so as to avoid arbitrary documentation against nuclear power. The standards must apply equally to nuclear and non-nuclear plants unless a sound distinguishing classification can be established. (See "A Citizen's Manual on Nuclear Energy 1974" available from Critical Mass, P.O. Box 1538, Washington, D.C. 20013.)

In Vermont, intervenor groups entered into a contract with Vermont Yankee, whereby the utility agreed to observe state radiation standards which are more stringent than the AEC's. This solution to failure of regulation by the AEC came about in Vermont at least partly due to the Governor and Attorney General, since both early took the position that nuclear power should be supervised more closely.

Utility Reform (RUCAG). One of the most volatile issues in states today is the manner and capacity of the state regulatory bodies to control the increasing costs of utilities. In response to this, many governors, attorneys general and legislators ran on platforms calling for improved regulation and greater control over the investor owned utilities.

These campaigns were urged in response to the frustration of consumers in their efforts to challenge the utilities and press their views on the regulatory body. What residential utility customers need most is organization and a full time staff that can present their needs and demands to the utilities, the utility commission, the courts and the state legislature. The utilities have no trouble presenting their demands; they charge the public for the costs of the rate proceedings. The commercial and industrial concerns can afford outside counsel and experts to present their concerns. A checkoff procedure is the best way for the residential utility consumer to gain representation and be a full participant in the decision making process.

The full time staff and organization would be funded through the utility bill checkoff. Included with every monthly bill sent to residential consumers, be it telephone, electric, gas, water or other regulated utility, would be either a check off card or a well designated provision on the bill itself. If the consumer desired, he or she could check-off the amount to be contributed to their action group and add it to their utility bill. The utility would then be obligated, under strict state audit, to pass such contributions over to the Residential Utility Consumer Action Group (RUCAG).

RUCAG's constitution and by-laws could be developed by statute through the normal legislative channel or citizens could convene a utility consumers convention. The structure of the group should insure its control by utility consumers and not by the utilities, their employees or their indentured government agencies. Consumers would hold annual meetings, set overall policy, elect a Board of Directors, and develop their own vehicle for self help.

proposal, send a stamped, self addressed envelope to Martin Regal, Esq., P.O. Box 19312, Washington, D.C., 20036.

State Energy Conservation Programs. The federal government has failed to adequately address the energy problems facing this country. It now becomes incumbent on the leaders of revitalized state governments to provide the foresight and imagination necessary to curtail energy use. Some suggestions for action:

(1) Energy efficiency labeling of appliances, autos, heating and cooling systems, lighting systems and insulation. A variation on this theme is requiring purchase and design information to include a life cycle cost figure as well as the initial purchase price.

(2) Energy impact statements for construction of major buildings, highways, public works projects, and electric power plants. By requiring an energy impact statement prior to construction, a state can gain knowledge and some degree of control over the new high users of energy.

(3) Ban or tax nonreturnable beverage containers.

(4) Reduce auto use through traffic fare subsidies, construction of bike paths, and surcharges on downtown parking. Successful experiments with transit fare subsidies by Seattle and other cities should be studied and replicated. Arlington, Virginia is greatly expanding its system of bike paths and may serve as a model for similar programs. In Oregon a portion of the road use tax fund has been diverted to construction of bike paths.

(5) A major priority for the forthcoming legislative session should be opening your highway trust fund to alternative transportation opportunities.

(6) Provision of low cost and accessible financing of insulation and weatherproofing improvements in existing buildings and fiscal incentives for insulation, weatherproofing and installation of solar heating equipment. Michigan has encouraged an electric utility company to provide low cost financing for home insulation improvements and Maine has encouraged such improvements in its "Project Fuel." Indiana has provided for an exemption from the property tax for the first two or three thousand dollars of the cost of solar heating equipment.

State legislators also have the responsibility to oversee the activities of the various state agencies. Are they saving energy through their procurement policies? Why not convene state legislative hearings to determine what each agency is doing. Do they consider the energy efficiency of their purchases and the life cycle costs?

There is a great deal that can be done on the state level. Take such ideas and provide the energy leadership that is lacking in this country.

Automotive Air Pollution. The problem of automotive air pollution is national and originates with the oligopolistic auto industry. The near-term solution is low-emission vehicles with long-term emphasis on more rational transportation systems. To achieve low emission levels from motor vehicles, the burden must be placed on the auto industry rather than the consumer. The following is a short outline of areas where state action can shift the burden for vehicle emission control to the manufacturers and avoid more costly or restrictive transportation controls.

I. Vehicle Emission Inspection/Maintenance Systems.

A. Inspection/maintenance programs reduce emissions, save fuel and protect consumers.

1. Infrequent high emission vehicles, these programs provide data base for recall of the vehicles by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

2. Frequent correction in minor tune-up or adjustment of carburetor air-fuel ratio which generally results in improvement of fuel economy.

3. Inspection can invoke the warranty provisions of the Clean Air Act.

4. Can be carried out in conjunction with safety inspections which are mandatory if states are not to lose their highway funds from the federal government.

II. Excess Emissions and Gasoline Consumption Charges.

A. Higher fees could be charged for higher polluting and less fuel efficient automobiles in the same manner that some states already distinguish in a rough fashion between heavy and light motor vehicles.

1. Generates revenue which can finance state mass transportation systems.

2. Encourages conservation of gasoline and lower polluting vehicles while not affecting directly lower income groups who purchase used cars.

III. State Inspection of Leadfree Gasoline.

A. Leadfree gasoline is absolutely necessary to prevent damage to catalysts on new cars.

1. Insures low emission levels thus offsetting need for more stringent transportation controls.

2. Prevents consumer from paying for catalyst replacement.

3. Can be done by state weights and measures departments.

Safe Drinking Water and Water Pollution. Recent disclosures linking cancer to contaminated drinking water have alerted the American public to our dangerous drinking water situation. Existing standards cover neither viruses nor most industrial chemicals or heavy metals which are not screened out by the purification methodology in widespread use in this country and which, consequently, are making their way from our polluted lakes and streams into our tap water. The Safe Drinking Water Act now awaiting presidential signature would set minimum national standards to be enforced by the states or, if a state is seriously derelict, by the federal government.

Even if the Safe Drinking Water Act becomes law, of course, action at the state level will be needed to ensure state enforcement capabilities. But beyond that, the protection provided by the minimum national standards will leave serious gaps which call for state response. For example, while the proposed federal law would ultimately require public water systems to use the best available technology to purify drinking water, the law's applicability to the polluters responsible for contamination is limited, and in any event, unclear. A hard-pressed local community should not have to pay for expensive technology to remove lethal chemicals dumped into their supply by an upstream polluter. State legislation is needed to ensure that the pollution is cleaned up at the source and that the polluter and not the water drinker pays for this.

An even more serious situation exists when the best available technology does not completely take out dangerous pollutants in the drinking water source. Laws are needed which require swift termination of pollution that contributes to significant health risk and which permit citizen groups and water systems to obtain an injunction against the polluter. Laws also must provide consumers with up-to-date information about their water systems as well as give these consumers the right to sue in state court to compel public water systems to comply with health standards and to compel state officials to carry out their enforcement duties.

Another defect in the federal water pollution laws is the failure to provide incentives for polluters to develop and implement new, innovative technologies that would reduce pollution below current acceptable limits. These limits are typically based on an estimate of what available technology can achieve. By enacting a tax to be levied on polluters—to supplement our current regulatory scheme—a state would encourage needed technological improvements and pollution reduction, generate new state revenues which would possibly permit tax cuts in other areas, and provide a model solution for other jurisdictions to emulate.

Further, the Residential Users Consumer Action Group (RUCAG) proposal for consumer-sponsored scrutiny of utility performance is of course applicable to public water systems.

IV. ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL REFORMS

Property Taxes. The first item on the property tax agenda is to take the burden of the tax off of the small taxpayer by elimination of all loopholes and a return to the original concept of a tax on all property.

The largest property tax loophole by far is that for "intangible" property—stocks, bonds and the like. There are several times more of this property in the country than real estate, and most of it is owned by the nation's wealthiest people. Just a modest tax on the more common forms of intangible property would cut real estate taxes by at least one-third nationwide. The myth that such a tax cannot be administered has been dispelled by the recent one-year experiment in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Florida all have working versions of taxes on intangible property. Closing this one egregious loophole could go far towards solving pressing school finance problems while helping small taxpayers.

The growing exemptions for commercial and industrial equipment, machinery, and inventories are another fertile source of potential revenues. Even more important are the underassessment and nonassessment of large mineral, commercial, industrial and other forms of property, which alone are costing a minimum of $7-$10 billion each year.

The best way to keep property tax exemptions and loopholes under control is to treat them as other expenditures and review their costs and benefits regularly, at least every three years. They should also appear in each year's budget. The U.S. Treasury and the state of California have already initiated this "tax expenditure budget" approach.

It will do little good to close property tax loopholes unless the tax laws are administered properly. General reform of property tax assessing and administration is an urgent need in most states. States such as Oregon and California show the progress that is possible when the legislature makes up its mind to act. Wisconsin recently took the progressive step of empowering a team of qualified state appraisers to assess complex commercial and industrial property throughout the state. This is an advance which could readily be duplicated elsewhere.

Crucial to assessment reform is the assessing of property at 100% full value. Any other system confuses taxpayers and makes them vulnerable to manipulation by public officials. States such as Oregon and parts of Kentucky have dispelled the myth that the public automatically rejects assessing at close to full value.

The single most effective way to insure fair assessing is to provide taxpayers with complete assessment information. Each property taxpayer should receive with their assessment notices a form showing the actual level of assessments for each type of property in their jurisdiction, a brief statement of the taxpayer's rights and the standards the assessor is bound to follow, and instructions for making appeals.

Larger assessing jurisdictions would help diminish "tax blackmail," whereby large businesses resist fair taxation by threatening to move elsewhere. And larger jurisdictions would enable localities to base their land-use decisions on factors other than a chronic and obsessive need for more "ratables." The seven counties in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area have agreed to share all additions to their commercial and industrial tax bases, a signal stride. Senator Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) has introduced legislation which would protect local governments, taxpayers, and workers against renegade industries. This legislation merits careful study.

For more information on property taxes, write to People & Taxes, P.O. Box 14198, Washington, D.C. 20044. (Subscriptions are $6.50 for individuals; $9.50 for businesses, professionals and institutions. Published twelve times a year.)

State Antitrust. At a time of accelerating prices, people are understandably turning to the antitrust laws. When firms collude, prices rise and income is misdistributed from consumers to producers. According to Thomas Kauper, head of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, price-fixing costs consumers $80 billion a year. Instead of economists meeting in televised seminars in Washington to haggle over a $10 billion cut in federal spending, state and local officials should be concentrating on tough antitrust enforcement to cut $80 billion from retail prices.

State antitrust laws drastically vary. Two years ago Virginia had an antitrust enforcement budget of $1,500, Missouri $9,000, New York State $250,000. Some provided treble damages for local violations while others did not. There are a calendar of items necessary for state antitrust to be an effective inflation-fighter.

(a) Budgets must be adequate, not like Virginia's and Missouri's. Of course there are competing interests for state revenues, but antitrust efforts are an especially worthy investment of state funds, for they can return dividends to consumers that far exceed their investments as taxpayers.

(b) Antitrust crimes (like price-fixing or market divisions) should be felonies, not misdemeanors, and should carry stiff penalties (e.g., jail sentences of 1-3 years, and fines of $500,000 or two percent of a firm's gross revenue) in order to deter behavior. Previously, lump antitrust penalties have been viewed as a cost of doing business.

(c) In addition, there should be a provision for treble damages in private antitrust actions at the state level; the use of economists to watch price levels of similar products in different cities in order to launch antitrust probes when a half gallon of milk or a haircut costs 50 percent more in Town X than in Town Y for no apparent reason; and so-called fair-trade laws—which balk consumers of millions in the form of "vertical" price-fixing—should be abolished.

Banking and Consumer Credit Reforms:

1. Consumer Credit. Legislatures should abolish the holder in due course doctrine. Several states have abolished the doctrine for certain categories of consumer loans and a new federal law would limit the application of the doctrine to bank credit cards. The Rule of 78s, a complicated method used by banks in computing interest on consumer loans, should also be abolished and replaced with a per diem charge. The Model Consumer Credit Act developed by the National Consumer Law Center in Boston should be used as a consumer oriented alternative to the Uniform Consumer Credit Code which is being considered by many state legislatures. The Law Center's Model Act contains important limitations on the creditors' remedies which are unnecessarily burdensome to debtors.

2. Mortgage Lending. Legislation should be enacted to require the payment of interest on mortgage escrow accounts. Mortgage lenders should also be required to send letters of advice to home owners who have missed a mortgage payment and to provide the home owner with an opportunity to explain the late payment.

3. Criteria for Chartering, Branching, or Relocating Banks and Savings and Loans. State Banking Departments and state Savings and Loans Commissions should be directed by statute to consider whether banks and savings and loans are adequately meeting the financial needs of the community in which they operate when passing upon applications to branch or relocate. The California Savings and Loan Commission has recently issued branching criteria which focus on the responsibility of savings and loans to extend credit and employment opportunities to minorities and women.

4. Disclosure Statute for Mortgage Loans: Redlining. Savings and loans and commercial banks should be required by law to disclose the geographic location of their mortgage loans. This would enable officials and community groups to detect a pattern of refusal to make mortgage loans in certain neighborhoods, a practice known as redlining. The City of Chicago has passed an ordinance requiring such disclosures.

State Consumer Protection Agency. To assure that the voice of the people is heard by the governmental decision makers who regulate business practices, a proposal was developed about five years ago in the United States Congress for a Consumer Protection Agency. In 1974 it passed the House of Representatives by a 3 to 1 margin and was barely defeated by a filibuster in which 65 senators—one less than the needed two-thirds—voted for cloture.

With no authority for it to impose fines or penalties, to set standards or to force businesses to change their practices, the bill would create a non-regulatory advocate to appear before federal regulatory agencies and departments for consumers who purchase or acquire goods and services in the marketplace, just as legions of attorneys and lobbyists now represent the interests of those who produce these goods and services. The concept of a governmental advocate for a particular interest group is not new; there are now numerous, much larger agencies and departments which explicitly advocate, promote and subsidize industry and commerce.

The need for a professional consumer advocate who can gather technical information, intervene and participate before agencies, and seek judicial review is not unique to federal programs. The same abuses, the same absence of consumer representation, the same resultant misallocation of the public's resources occur in state and local government. As a small anti-inflationary advocate before executive agencies, the consumer representative could concentrate on the rigid and hitherto unchallenged policies which bloat governmental decisionmaking. By opening the closed door behind which most government decisions are made, the consumer advocate would help restore public confidence in the operation of government. It could demand that agency actions be substantiated in writing to permit proper evaluation and judicial appeals. Where there is blatant disregard of consumer interests, an advocate equipped with essential expertise should be able to take the consumer's case to court. (Copies of S. 707 and its committee report are available from the Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization, United States Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.)

Earlier this year the state of New Jersey enacted a broad bill setting up a Department of Public Advocate with authority to represent and protect the public interest in rate-making and other administrative and judicial proceedings. The Public Advocate has full, unfettered authority to challenge a questionable agency decision. The "public interest" the Public Advocate is charged with representing is defined as "an interest or right arising from the constitution, decisions of court, common law or other laws of the United States or of this State."

In a number of ways the New Jersey statute gives more authority to the Public Advocate than would the proposed federal legislation. For example, the federal bill provides that if the consumer advocate receives complaints from consumers it can merely refer them to another agency charged with enforcing the relevant laws. It cannot compel action to remedy a specific consumer grievance. The

New Jersey advocate in contrast can institute a proceeding before any agency, department or board of the state with responsibility for resolving consumer complaints. Even without the federal legislation, which will pass the Congress in 1975, the rights of consumers would vastly improve if other state legislatures would emulate the New Jersey precedent.

Small Claims Court. The ultimate public check on business practices is unavailable to the average consumer. Lawyers are interested in "big" cases, defined in monetary terms, and consumer grievances are "small." Citizens resent the cost of hiring lawyers, and the courts are so hopelessly backlogged that delayed justice often results in no justice at all.

There is a ray of hope, however. And that ray is represented by Small Claims Courts.

Small Claims Courts could provide a forum for swift, simple and inexpensive dispute resolution. In those few states where they do not exist, they should be created; where they do exist, their services need to be considerably expanded and drastically reformed.

1. States should publicize their Small Claims Courts. Radio and TV ads should make the courts' availability known to the general public; also, at the courts and at other locations, clear booklets describing court procedures should be available. All this information, of course, should be in whatever languages are commonly spoken by the state's citizens.

2. States should expand court hours. This expansion should include evening sessions and Saturday sessions. People who have day-time five day a week jobs should not have to lose time from work to pursue their Small Claims Court cases.

3. Jurisdictional amounts should be set at realistic levels. In a time of inflation, any limit that was set as long ago as two or three years should be reviewed in the light of the costs of consumer goods and services.

4. The Small Claims Courts should be given power (equity power) to make judgments ordering relief such as occupancy of apartments, return of goods, repair of goods or carrying out of other services. In most states, Small Claims judgments can only be for money.

5. States should improve the means available for individuals who seek to sue corporations. Now, the individual must contact a state office to find the name of the corporation's agent for receipt of legal process; this chore should be undertaken for the individual by the clerk of the court, or else should be made easier by the locating of state corporation records at points convenient to the Small Claims Courts.

6. Assistance by community aides, such as the program pioneered at New York City's Harlem Small Claims Court, should be available throughout the country, at all Small Claims Courts.

7. States should improve safeguards against fraudulent process serving. Particularly in Small Claims Courts, this practice has led to issuance of unfair default judgments.

8. Courts should be encouraged to deal with the problem of their excessive use as collection agents by setting new substantive standards; only credit prudently extended should be an allowable basis for a court-enforced collection. This "prudent lender" doctrine, adopted by state legislatures or developed by judges, would eliminate this unfortunate spectacle.

9. States should eliminate the problem of judgment collection. Commonly, as many as half of the winning consumer plaintiffs never collect the money they are awarded. Collecting judgments should be handled by the states in newer ways; for example, an insurance fund analogous to the uninsured motorist funds in the states could be established to cover uncollected judgments; civil servants, such as sheriffs, should replace the politically appointed marshals who execute judgments for a percentage of the take and who are notoriously reluctant to collect small amounts; also, for businesses that do not pay judgments, provisions should be made for their identification and for subjecting their principals to severe penalties for the failings of their establishments to honor the judgments of the court.

10. States should make legal assistance available free to consumers who win at Small Claims Courts but whose cases can be appealed to the higher courts where a lawyer's help is needed.

For more information on Small Claims Courts, write to the Center for Auto Safety, 1346 Connecticut Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. The cost for the study is $5.00. To obtain a model booklet for use in publicizing the courts, send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to the Center for Study of Responsive Law, P.O. Box 19367, Washington, D.C. 20036.

V. HEALTH RELATED REFORMS

Hospital Costs. In 1971 Maryland became the first state to enact comprehensive, publicly accountable, rate-setting requirements for all hospitals in the state.

The Health Services Cost Review Commission, an independent state agency, is charged with verifying costs and eliminating conflicts of interest in all Maryland hospitals. The seven member commission reviews all financial data submitted annually by hospitals pursuant to uniform accounting requirements established by the Commission. The Commission, after public hearings, is empowered to lower or raise the rates charged by any hospital if it determines that the rates are not reasonably related to the costs incurred by the hospital.

The Commission examines the costs incurred by each hospital department in order to clarify actual costs and to examine the effects of hospital-encouraged subsidizing of less profitable departments by other more profitable departments. For example, the department of radiology might charge higher prices to subsidize the hospital's emergency room services.

All Commission data, including all submissions by hospitals, are open to public inspection.

The Commission has been responsible for fiscal changes in Bethesda, Maryland's Suburban Hospital, for example, which have forced the Hospital to upgrade its staff and equipment levels or to face the prospects of lowering its rates under Commission order. Suburban Hospital, a non-profit facility, has profits and reserves totaling in excess of $22 million.

Details of Commission activity, including Commission regulations are available from: Harold Cohen, Ph.D., Executive Director, Health Services Cost Review Commission, 2100 Guilford Avenue, Baltimore, Md. 21218, (301) 383-4175.

Other state legislatures have passed similar legislation. It is a good vehicle for developing some control over our health institutions presently and is a method for curbing the spiraling inflation in hospital costs.

Posting of Prescription Drug Prices. The price of prescription drugs affects everyone periodically, and is a continuous expense for some. It falls often on those who can least afford it—the elderly, the indigent and the chronically ill.

Prescription drug consumption and prices have been steadily rising in the U.S. over the last 15 years. In 1959, the average family bought 11 prescriptions at a cost of $33.00 or $3.00 per prescription. In 1966, the average family bought 15.9 prescriptions at a cost of $54.54 or $3.43 per prescription, a rise in cost of almost 16% per prescription. And, these figures were compiled before the raging inflation now plaguing the country.

These rising costs are a result of the policies of the drug manufacturers, pharmacists and physicians. Pharmaceutical companies earn nearly two times the profit of other manufacturing concerns on investment.

There are two ways these inequities can be removed—mandatory posting of drug prices and the elimination of the ban on pharmacy price advertising of prescription items, and elimination of antitrust laws which prevent a pharmacist from dispensing anything but the precise drug prescribed by the physician if that drug is a brand name product. This blocks the pharmacist from substituting for a brand name drug its generic equivalent which is much lower in price but otherwise tested to be identical. Antitrust laws operate largely to protect the companies which sell brand name products. They were intended initially to stop pharmacists from changing the prescription to a different drug, not the substitution of a cheaper version of the same drug.

Consumers should have the right to shop for prescriptions by price and have the benefit of the lower priced generic equivalent. Passage of laws dedicated to these ends will loosen the stranglehold of the major drug manufacturers over the consumers, the pharmacists and the doctors.

Tax On Soft Drinks To Fund Health Facilities. The state of West Virginia has used revenues gained from taxing the manufacturing of soft drinks to build a medical center. Soft drinks offer not only little or no nutritional value, but they are considered harmful to people's health. Considering these health concerns, a tax was placed at the manufacturing level, where it is least likely to be passed on to the consumer, and the state and citizens obtain the benefit of increased health care facilities from tax revenues generated from a cause of health problems.

Ban on Use of Prisoners for Experimentation. Ethical medical research demands, among other things, the informed consent of its subjects. Informed consent cannot be given under coercion. Imprisonment is an inherently coercive situation, and the idea of "volunteer" in prison experiments is ridiculous.

The prison population is comprised in large part of the poor and disadvantaged, those least likely to comprehend the complexities of research when told about them. The majority of prisoners at the Maryland House of Detention, for example, are functional illiterates. Prisoners are at the mercy of prison personnel. Conditions of prison life, parole and release are dependent on judgments of those same personnel. Desperate for "good behavior" judgments, prisoners are likely to feel compelled to participate upon the mere suggestion of their jailors.

Prisoners may participate in experiments for temporary improvement of intolerable conditions, or for meager amounts of money. Prisoners at the Maryland House of Detention, for example, undergo tortuous and often recurrent bouts of malaria and other infectious diseases, in return for access to a television set, a quiet ward, and pay of $2.00 a day.

There have been a number of restrictions on prisoner tests in recent years. England has prohibited it entirely. The states of Oregon, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Missouri have prohibited all prison experiments. Legislation banning psychotropic drug research in Massachusetts prisons, and all such research in federal prisons, is pending. The practice should be eliminated in all states.

VI. OTHER LEGISLATIVE RESPONSIBILITIES: OVERSIGHT

Equal to your role as lawmakers and providing leadership is your obligation to see that all the laws already passed are working and effectively implemented. The role of oversight of governmental agencies is crucial to your knowledge of the need for new laws and amendments of old. For example, your budgetary and tax responsibilities hinge on how well each state agency performs its services. A previous legislature may have passed progressive consumer and environmental protection laws, but they may not be properly enforced, and, therefore, are wasted.

The most infrequent oversight occurs when the Governor and majority of the state legislature are of the same political party. However, that is usually the time that oversight is most often required to combat complacency and inefficiency. It is up to the various committees to keep track of the successes and failures of the state agencies, and to determine if the hard earned dollars paid in taxes by the citizens are properly expended. Yet these committees rarely exercise their power and duties of oversight.

A REAL BREAKTHROUGH ON ARMS LIMITATIONS IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate a most encouraging event in Latin America. Last week eight nations in Latin America agreed to seek arms limitations and to stop purchasing offensive weapons. The eight nations are Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Argentina, Colombia, and Panama.

This is a major step forward. It sets in motion the possibility of seeking an overall arms limitation agreement covering the entire region. This will release badly needed resources within Latin America for economic development. And it will help get us out of the arms trade in this hemisphere and the continuing danger of feeding two sides of a potential war.

This agreement has received surprisingly little attention thus far.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a news report in the December 13 New York Times and an article in today's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 13, 1974]
EIGHT LATIN NATIONS DECLARE INTENTION TO LIMIT ARMS

(By David Binder)

WASHINGTON, December 12.—Eight Latin American countries, after a three-day meeting in Peru, have issued a declaration of agreement to limit armaments and to stop acquiring offensive weapons. The eight were Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Argentina, Colombia and Panama.

All of these signers have been involved in frontier clashes in the past and some still lay claim to territory in neighboring countries.

The declaration, which contains no specifics on types or numbers of weapons, was hailed today by William D. Rogers, the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, as "an extraordinary and unprecedented step which could substantially reduce tensions in the hemisphere."

BRAZIL PARTICIPATION SOUGHT

Mr. Rogers, who attended the signing of the declaration Monday in Ayacucho, Peru, returned to Washington last night.

United States officials said that the agreement would require the addition of Brazil to make it really effective. Brazil is the largest and most powerful country of the continent and borders six other states. A follow-up meeting has been scheduled for next summer in Caracas, Venezuela, with all Latin-American countries attending.

The occasion for the latest meeting was the 150th anniversary of the battle of Ayacucho, in which Simon Bolivar finally defeated the Spanish colonial empire in Latin America.

One reason for the disarmament agreement expressed in the declaration was to divert arms expenditures to economic and social projects, Mr. Rogers noted at a press briefing.

But he added that the United States considered the agreement "most hopeful" on the expressed intention to solve future problems among the signers through peaceful means.

SOME FRONTIER DISPUTES

One frontier problem referred to specifically in the declaration involves landlocked Bolivia's wish for access to the sea. But Latin-American specialists said the agreement would also have a bearing on traditional disputes between Colombia and Venezuela, Venezuela and Guyana and Peru and Chile.

The declaration also expressed the intention to bring together foreign ministers and defense ministers of the eight countries in the event of a threat to peace in the region.

Mr. Rogers said that the declaration "goes far beyond the Rio treaty" of 1946, in which the hemisphere countries agreed on the principle of nonaggression and mutual defense.

U.S. DELEGATION PRESENT

Mr. Rogers said that he had the impression that the eight countries intended the declaration to be a vehicle for new forms of Latin-American solidarity and cooperation.

The United States was one of several countries to send guest delegations to the Ayacucho meetings that began last Friday. Canada and Cuba were also represented.

"Our attitude is one of great interest toward the intentions of the Ayacucho signatories," Mr. Rogers said. "But we are not yet sure where we go from here."

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 19, 1973]

THE OTHER ARMS RACE

(By Victor Zorza)

Very little attention has been paid in the outside world to a remarkable Latin American initiative which may result in the limitation of conventional arms in that area and, perhaps by way of an example, in other parts of the world.

The nuclear arms race consumes only a fifth of world arms expenditure. The other 80 per cent goes on conventional arms. The most expensive of these are sold by the industrial world to what it calls the backward countries—much as early Western traders sold rifles to the natives.

Latin America, which has long provided a market for such exports, has seen many unsuccessful arms limitation initiatives in the past. This time, however, the eight members of the Andean group of countries, including, most notably, the mutually hostile regimes of Chile and Peru, have agreed on a pledge to bring about "effective arms limitation." They will, in particular, "put an end" to the purchase of offensive weapons from foreign suppliers.

The history of Latin America and of disarmament is littered with high-sounding statements of this kind, but the background of the Declaration, issued this month in Lima, the capital of Peru, is made up of practical politics, not of pious hopes. Most of the previous Latin American disarmament proposals were the result of U.S. prompting, and this doomed them to failure from the start, but the Lima Declaration is a genuine home grown product.

The idea was first broached by President Velasco of Peru at the beginning of this year, and its formal promulgation during the Lima meeting came as something of a surprise to the United States. When Velasco first proposed it, he was replying to foreign criticism of Peru's purchase of Soviet tanks—the first Soviet appearance as a major arms supplier on this continent. He insisted on Peru's right to get its arms from any country, but at the same time suggested a freeze on current Latin American arms levels by imposing a 10-year moratorium on arms purchases.

His proposal was dismissed as a propaganda effort designed to reduce the impact of the Soviet arms deal. This had so alarmed the new Chile regime that it promptly pressed the United States, with some success, for "balancing" arms supplies. A new arms race was in the making.

Arms spending has rarely exceeded 3 per cent of the GNP by any of the Latin American countries, compared with 5 per cent for developing countries generally, and nearly 7 per cent for the industrial countries. But Latin America can ill afford even the lower levels of arms spending, and any competition between the United States and the Soviet Union as arms suppliers would bring to the area the kind of instability which now bedevils relations in other regions of the world.

The Peruvian regime was grateful for the Soviet tanks, which the Kremlin eagerly provided on easy terms, but the Velasco regime is far more interested in social reform and economic development than in military splendor. It knows that, to carry out its ambitions, it must limit and, if possible, reduce the claims of defense on resources that are already inadequate.

In Chile, too, the regime is not unconcerned about economic development, but it is particularly alarmed by the prospect of a gradual accumulation of Soviet weapons in the hands of a potentially warlike neighbor. The Chile regime, internally insecure as its suppression of Allende supporters shows, is clearly anxious to mitigate any external threat, especially if it appears to be Communist-inspired. The Peru regime is certainly not Communist—but Soviet arms are.

In this way the political interests of both Chile and Peru, however hostile the two regimes may be, require the reduction and, if possible, the termination of the flow of foreign arms to the area. The private conversations between the eight governments in the past year are known to have been as serious as the public propaganda war between Chile and Peru was irresponsible. Tanks, for instance, have been mentioned as being among the imports to be banned—and that would be a very promising beginning.

Brazil, although the most powerful country on the continent, was not included in the earlier stages because it is not a member of the Andean group. But Brazil is to be invited to next year's summit meeting in Caracas which ought to give more practical expression to the Lima Declaration. In the meantime, staff talks between the participating countries will attempt to work out the details of the formal agreement to be signed by the heads of state.

The common culture and history of most Latin American countries, their liberation by Simon Bolivar 150 years ago at the battle of Ayacucho which forms a passionate and lasting bond between them, the economic links which they have been trying to forge in recent years in an attempt at integration—all these help to promote the arms limitation agreement. The Lima meeting, in fact, was held to commemorate the battle of Ayacucho. There are other parts of the world, such as West Africa, for instance, where politics and tradition combine with the low intensity of local conflicts and the low level of arms spending to make such agreements possible.

Here it is the arrival of Soviet arms on the scene that has stimulated serious interest in arms limitation efforts. Elsewhere

Soviet and U.S. and European arms suppliers are already in serious competition. But one successful example of such arms limitation could do a great deal to show the way. Latin America, once derided as the continent of military coups, could yet prove to be an example for the rest of the world.

SENATOR JAMES L. BUCKLEY ON RUSSIAN TRIP

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I rise in order to keep a promise I made on November 14, 1974, in Moscow to Nikolai Scholokov, the Soviet Minister of the Interior.

I hasten to state that my interest in meeting Mr. Scholokov had nothing to do with my membership on the Interior Committee, as his responsibilities are of quite another order than those of Secretary Rogers Morton. In the Soviet Union, the Minister of the Interior might be described as the man who is in charge of the Gulag Archipelago. He is also the man in charge of issuing exit permits to those seeking to exercise their human right of emigration, a right that the Jackson amendment to the trade bill now in conference seeks to translate into meaningful reality.

I told Mr. Scholokov that I had sought the meeting for several reasons:

First, I had been given, prior to my departure for the Soviet Union, the names of a number of Lithuanians and Ukrainians who have been seeking permission to leave the Soviet Union and join relatives now living in the United States, and I had been asked to make a plea on their behalf to a high official of the Soviet Union.

Second, I had been asked to plead for a cessation of the harassment visited upon Soviet Jews seeking to emigrate to Israel.

Third, I had been asked to intercede on behalf of two individuals now in Soviet prisons who were reported to be on the verge of death.

Fourth, I had been asked to express the widespread concern in the United States over reports of a recent upsurge and intensification of the campaign against religion in the Ukraine, Lithuania, and now—as a result of Soviet pressures—in Czechoslovakia.

Finally, I stated that I wanted the opportunity to convey to a highly placed official the seriousness of the Congress concern over the refusal of the Soviet Union to allow freedom of emigration. I said that I understood that the Soviet Government considered their emigration policies to be a matter of internal concern only, and therefore none of the business of foreigners. On the other hand, I said that he would have to understand that it was uniquely our business as to what conditions we might choose to attach to credits extended at preferential interest rates to finance the purchase by Russia of the American technology she badly wanted to have.

The Minister commented on these and other points I made during our long discussion and ended with the following request:

Please tell the other Senators exactly what I have told you. Everything I have told you is the full truth. Soviet leaders are as good as their words.

I shall now proceed to carry out my promise, quoting Mr. Scholokov as faithfully as I can from memory:

With respect to the suggestion that anyone in a Soviet prison might be in need of medical attention or might be subject to brutality:

We have fine hospitals and excellent doctors at all our prisons. Everyone in a prison gets good medical treatment as anyone in the Soviet Union. It is against the law for anyone to mistreat a prisoner, and I will on the spot punish those who encroach on the rights of prisoners. All our prisoners (who are required to work hard in connection with our rehabilitation program) receive 4,500 calories of food a day, which is far more than the 2,000 calories you and I require.

To the charge that there is religious repression within the Soviet Union:

Another dead cat! The law guarantees everyone in the Soviet Union freedom of religion, and the law is faithfully applied. Ask anyone, ask the priests and bishops of the Russian Orthodox Church, and they will tell you that they and their parishioners enjoy the fullest religious freedom. I'll show you a film that shows we have religious freedom.

At this point, Mr. President, I told the minister that if these reports are "dead cats," he would be astonished at the platoons of dead cats now roaming the West.

To the charge that the Soviet Union did not permit freedom of emigration:

You have been speaking with malcontents. Everyone who applies for an exit visa gets it at all levels. We do not hold anybody except those held because they break Soviet laws. I can give you the figures. Everyone who wants to emigrate has the right. The only grounds to refuse exit visas are possession of state secrets—just as is the case in your country. There is a five year guarantee on possession of state secrets. The problem of emigration doesn't exist. It is only invented by those who are interested in destroying the good relations of our two countries. Be assured that what I am saying is true.

To the charge that immediately after the publication of the exchange of letters between Secretary Kissinger and Senator Jackson regarding Soviet undertakings to liberalize their emigration policy, Soviet Jews seeking to emigrate to Israel have been subjected to an intensification of harassment, including the loss of jobs, threats of prosecution, and the disconnection of telephones:

Such facts are not known to me. They are phony. It is probably the work of hoodlums.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, I did not have the presence of mind to ask in whose employ these hoodlums might be. In any event, what I have just cited reflects the essence of the messages Mr. Scholokov wanted me to convey to our colleagues. I have, however, other messages that I would also like to convey from Moscow. These are messages given me by many of the "malcontents" whom it was my privilege to meet during my brief stay.

On the first day of my visit, I found myself among more than 200 Jews on the street in front of Moscow's only synagogue—there are more than half a million Jews in Moscow—who were passing the time between religious services talking to one another. People were soon bringing me letters, some for delivery to Senator Jackson, describing their concerns and detailing their experiences. I would like to read three of them:

DEAR SENATOR: I ask your assistance in the difficult situation, in which I, as a Jewish activist, was put by the Soviet authorities, despite the promise not to interrupt communications. Twenty-five of October, just a week after the publication of the assurance, given by the Soviet authorities to Mr. Kissinger, my telephone was disconnected. The case is especially grave, because by grandmother (76), with whom I live is seriously ill, and needs a telephone to call her doctor. Two words about myself. I applied for (an) exit visa two years ago, and was refused in spite of never being connected with any military secrets. I am twenty-seven years old, and I now don't have any work and I have no possibilities to finish my education.

JULIUS WEXLER.

Senator JAMES BUCKLEY.

DEAR SIR: We are a group of scientists desiring to leave the USSR in order to settle in Israel. Understanding very little and perhaps therefore not very interested in politics, however not to the extent as to forget that our fates and the security of our families depends very much on it. This is why we are extremely concerned by all the ups and downs of the proposed discussions between the Congress of the USA and the government leaders of the USSR. This is why we have so often addressed the government leaders of the USA despite certain doubts resulting from the delicacy of our civil status. However, we are convinced that true détente and an improvement in the relations between the two super powers may be attained only with real initial understanding which does not consist solely in formal declarations of mutual respect.

Without going into the details of the compromise which may be concluded between the Congress of the USA and Soviet leaders, we firmly believe that no compromise of this kind can be realistic unless measures for its control and execution are prepared in advance. Being a group of the more susceptible as a result of the particular attention which we receive from the Soviet authorities, we are also all the more sensitive to the various violations of the rights of Jewish minorities in the USSR since the traditional authority of the intelligentsia among the Jews forces many to turn to us of those people whose rights have been trampled upon. This makes it possible for us to express a proposal to inform the Congress of all the violations of the conditions of the proposed compromise if the Congress is really interested in carrying out these conditions.

Extremely important in the present situation is the question of means of communication with those abroad which at present are drastically reduced for us. In differentiation from our own fates which the USSR regards as its own internal business [without our agreement to this], international relations in general and communication among scientists in particular is not an internal matter of our government. There are international conventions which demand that the government comply with particular rules of postal and telephone communications. We don't even speak of mail whose services do not exist for us, but only recently in our group eight telephones have been disconnected, which had been used to talk with those in other countries. In the USA finally they must understand that the disconnection of telephones pursues a definite aim far from good will, and the stabilization of communications as one of the basic conditions for reaching any compromise must be established which in the opposite case will become one more empty exchange of politeness.

Please accept dear senator our assurances of the profoundest respect which the truly noble position of the US Congress arouses in us in a matter so far from your practical necessities as the civil rights of minorities in the Soviet Union.

OPEN LETTER

LEONID I. BREZHNEV, General Secretary of the Communist Party, U.S.S.R.:

We chose this method of approaching you because all our declarations to all offices, including those addressed to you personally, have remained without reply.

We are those who thru deception were separated from our parents, who were allowed by the authorities to leave for Israel. We, on the other hand, were refused for various, often unexplained reasons.

Both our parents and we were promised that soon the families could re-unite. Since then every office automatically repeated all sorts of promises, but no permission for departure is being given. Other Soviet representatives abroad are shamelessly making the same promises to our mothers, relatives and near ones.

Those being deceived are: Semen Amdurskii-Breslavskii, born 1948. His family left for Israel in November 1971. The authorities had promised he could leave in 1 month. The reason for refusal—service in the Army, which has been completed 5 years ago.

Veniamin Bogomolnyi, born 1946. Relatives are residing in Israel since 1970. He submitted application for departure in 1972. Reason for refusal—service in the Army which has been completed three years ago. During this period of his service he built living quarters.

Grigori Vigdarov, born 1947, Marina Vigdarov, born 1951 and their two children. Grigori's parents left for Israel in June 1973. Grigori and Marina were promised by the authorities that they would be able to leave in a few months. Reason for refusal—service in the Army completed six years ago.

Veniamin Grushko, born 1946. Parents residing in Israel since 1972. Submitted application for emigration in October 1973. Reason for refusal—studies at the N. Bauman Moscow Higher Technical School. Upon finishing school in 1970 has been working in the field of agricultural machinery. Work was never secret.

Iosif Shraiber, born 1951. Iosif's parents are in Israel since 1973. Iosif was promised that he would soon be given permission to leave. Reason for refusal—studies at the Saratov University.

This list is incomplete. You yourself can see that we are being detained in the USSR for reasons wherein any consideration of state security and secrecy would be laughable. In contradiction to the Soviet Constitution and all the Declaration of the Soviet government on the humanism of its policy we are still detained in the USSR. Possibly our personal letters to you did not reach you, therefore, we are approaching you thru open letter. In as much as you are now conducting official discussions with foreign representatives which concern our fates—fates of children separated from our parents we ask you specifically; do not detain us in the USSR, do not stand in the way of our reunification with our families.

We are the children of a people who often it had been attempted to detain in various countries but this was never considered to be just or humane.

We are not only prevented from living with our people, but the most ancient and natural connection has been torn asunder—that between parents and children. This is just pure inhumanity.

Let us join our fathers and mothers.

Moscow, November 2, 1974.

The next day I met with the distinguished Russian academician and champion of civil liberties, Andrei Sakharov. This meeting resulted from my desire to speak with some individuals whom I had been told were well informed on the current persecution of Baptists, Uniates, Roman Catholics, Jehovah Witnesses, and other religious groups within the Soviet Union. Although Sakharov is an atheist, his leadership in establishing the Committee on Human Rights in the Soviet Union and his passionate commitment to its goals enables him to speak with authority as to every aspect of current programs of religious repression.

Mr. President, I am happy to report that one of the ideas that came out of my conversation with Andrei Sakharov will soon become a reality.

During our meeting, he expressed the same fears over the Jackson-Kissinger compromise that I had heard the day before from the Jews outside the Moscow synagogue. He was deeply concerned that while we would be extending to the Soviet Union the benefits of most-favored-nation status and of preferential credits, the Soviets would maintain a systematic campaign of harassment that would discourage applications for exit permits as to enable the Soviets to allow token emigration and claim full compliance with the understandings given to Secretary of State Kissinger.

When I asked him how the true facts could be verified, he stated that thanks to the courage of the dissidents who maintained an underground network throughout the Soviet Union, the true facts as to the treatment accorded those seeking to emigrate could be ascertained with a sufficient degree of accuracy to determine whether the authorities were in fact living up to their agreement.

When I suggested to him that the Congress might establish some sort of entity for the specific purpose of maintaining day-by-day contact with these groups and monitoring Soviet compliance, he stated that it would be an excellent idea, and that the establishment of such a mechanism would do much to encourage those wanting to leave the Soviet Union to make the necessary applications. The idea arose while I was "brainstorming" with Sakharov in order to see if we could, together, come up with some ways to help make certain the Soviet rulers lived up to this agreement.

As you know, in our colloquy during debate on the trade bill last week, the Senator from Washington (Mr. Jackson) agreed that the Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations will be assigned the responsibility of surveillance of Soviet emigration. The subcommittee will act independently of the State Department. It will be in a position to assess compliance, and to recommend the cessation of MFS and credits if and when the Soviets are found to be in violation of their understanding as described in the exchange of letters between the Senator from Washington and the Secretary of State.

In our conversation, Sakharov placed great attention on the need to liberalize the Soviet system if we were not to invite future problems from a strengthened totalitarian state. He said we ought to bring pressures to bear for foreign newspapers and magazines to be freely available in Russian newsstands. He then stated that journalists and other Westerners ought to have full right of access to all parts of the Soviet Union. He strongly emphasized that we should also warn people in the West of the extraordinary measures that the Soviets continue to isolate their citizens from any contact with Westerners. Troublesome Jews were swept out of Moscow before Secretary of State Kissinger's last visit, just as Germans were "removed" at the time of Chancellor Schmidt's visit.

We were warned that when the Olympics take place in Moscow in 1980, not only will all dissidents be removed from the scene, but that Russians living outside of Moscow will be denied access to the city, lest they come into contact with foreigners.

That evening, representatives of a dozen of the most prominent Jewish families met with me in Moscow. Not a single family still had a working telephone because all of their phones had been disconnected—after the Soviets had undertaken to stop harassing individuals seeking to emigrate to Israel. Deprived of a telephone—even one that is tapped—these families are cut off not only from each other but from any hope of getting messages to an aid from the outside.

Evidence coming from the GULAG camps has convinced the dissidents that prison conditions are now in many ways worse than those that existed even during the barbarities of the Stalin era. One of my informants told me that Soviet regime has simply grown more sophisticated. Instead of the extermination camps of the Stalin years, there now exist camps dedicated to what might be called "protracted death," that is, death on the installment plan, in little pieces of psychological pressure, of inhuman discipline, and inhuman conditions, with the thread of life barely kept from snapping.

Applications to leave the Soviet Union are being met with new forms of harassment. Today, it is not just those individuals with the courage to apply for exit permits who feel the full weight of official displeasure. Today, not only they, but members of their family—even friends and employers—may find their work permits taken away, their education interrupted, their lives made unbearable in the thousand ways that are available to a totalitarian state. I emphasize that all this has increased, not decreased, since the announcement that some "agreement" had been reached with the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, when I was about to leave that crowded apartment in Moscow, where I had heard so many sickening stories of oppression and terror from representatives of the Jewish community, I turned to one of those present and complimented him on his bravery for continuing to struggle under such terrible conditions. He said:

But don't you see, Senator, we have to be brave. There is no other way out.

Mr. President, needless to say, those words made a lasting impression upon me. All of the sophisticated arguments for giving the Soviet leaders what they want in terms of economic benefits fade into insignificance when seen in the light of those words.

The next day I returned to Andrei Sakharov's apartment, this time to find out the details about a list of 6,000 Volga German families who had been trying to leave the Soviet Union which Mrs. Sakharov had handed to my aide, Leonard Saffir, during our earlier meeting. I had not asked for more information at the time because Dr. Sakharov follows a policy of saying everything that he has to say openly in full reach of the ever-present electronic bugs, rather than resorting to scribbled notes as so many others do to escape being overheard. I did not want the Soviet authorities to be aware that I had the list until I could take the precaution of making a copy and sending the original to my Washington office by diplomatic pouch.

Mr. President, in discussing the Volga Germans I think it is necessary to emphasize the fact that we are dealing with a nationality almost as large as the Jewish community—approximately 2 million versus 3 million—that they are treated as a separate nationality—the word "German" being stamped on their identity papers—and that they are subject to abuse in schools as "Hitlerites" and "Nazis," and denied opportunities for higher education. They are for the most part farmers and miners who are not in possession of state secrets nor of costly education that would justify the harassment of emigration. Their sin, apparently, is that of being exceptionally productive workers and, of course, of wanting to leave Mother Russia.

Dr. Sakharov informed that between 20 and 30 individuals who had helped compile the list were now in jail; that these families comprised more than 25,000 men, women, and children who had been seeking exit permits to no avail for well over a year; and that this was only a sampling of the ethnic Germans within the Soviet Union who given a chance would emigrate to West Germany. This list, in other words constituted compelling evidence that there are many nationalities within the Soviet Union, not only Soviet Jews, who are seeking the right to leave and carve out new lives elsewhere, and that they are meeting with the same obstacles to emigration as are Soviet Jews.

At this point, Mr. President, Dr. Sakharov described to me several examples of current religious repression in the Soviet Union in addition to the widely known facts about the persecution of Soviet Jews. He discussed the case of a Buddhist leader who had been imprisoned because he was drawing too large a following, and was reported to have died the day before as a result of mistreatment. He told us that there has been a virtual elimination of Baptist ministers through imprisonment and harassment.

In order to suppress religious instruction of the young, the Soviet authorities invoke a provision of a law that states that parents have the responsibility to raise their children in the highest Communist ethical tradition. This is interpreted to mean that parents teaching a child about God are in violation of the law. One form of punishment is to throw them in jail. A far more effective one is to take the children away from the parents and place them in an orphanage.

You do not need too many cases of this kind of persecution to have a major effect on a community. Another technique, especially in rural areas where public religious processions are still held, is for the police to pull in some of the younger participants for questioning at the local police station. Their names and identity numbers are taken down, although no charges are made. Nothing more is really needed. Because the state is in total control of education and jobs, the gesture is not an empty one.

The man acting as interpreter at our second meeting was Alexander Goldfarb, one of the most prominent of the younger dissidents—a very distinguished biochemist who can no longer practice biochemistry. He mentioned, when we were talking about the phenomenon of "state secrets" as an excuse dusted off at will to justify a refusal to issue exit permits, that this reason had been used in his case. He said that he had smuggled all the papers in his possession to the Weissman Institute in Israel, and had recently written the authorities that he had done so—

I told them that under the circumstances they had only two choices: either prosecute me for treason or let me go.

One has to admire this kind of naked courage.

My final meeting with a dissident, which took place just hours before my meeting with the Minister of the Interior, was with Mr. Mikhail Agursky, one of the individuals who has contributed to the book of articles on current life in the Soviet Union that Solzhenitsyn has just announced. After great effort, he and others had put together the group of Christians I had sought to speak to—but, unfortunately, it was too late. I did take a long walk with Mr. Agursky—followed at appropriate intervals by Soviet gumshoes—in which he reiterated much of what I had heard from others, and in which he went out of his way to warn me against being deceived by any talks with the clergy and hierarchy of the Russian Orthodox Church because it had been totally preempted by the Soviets and had long ago ceased to exist as a meaningful, independent religious body.

There are those who may ask, Mr. President, how it was that I was able to see so many dissidents, and that they felt so free to speak with me knowing that we were always being watched and listened to. Here I should mention the extraordinary immunity that currently accrues to those who manage to attract attention in the West—to the point that I was advised that I should publicly identify all those with whom I had contact. The Soviets are currently particularly anxious to avoid a bad press because of their desire to gain the benefits of our technology through expanded trade.

It was for this reason that everyone I spoke with gave me permission—in fact urged me—to take down their names. It was for this reason that I delivered those names, together with the names of all for whom I had been specifically asked to intercede, to the Minister of the Interior at the time of our meeting. It is for this reason, Mr. President, that I ask unanimous consent that those same names and lists be printed in the Record at the conclusion of these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, how shall I summarize the messages given me by all these "malcontents," messages that they are deeply anxious that those who are privileged to live in the free societies of the West not only receive, but fully understand? Basically they urged the necessity for maintaining pressures on the Soviets, the importance of safeguards, the importance of maintaining open lanes of communication with the peoples of the Soviet Union. They stressed that if we are really to achieve the objective of détente, there must be a liberalizing of the Soviet system so that ideas and people can circulate. They all were emphatic about the importance of the Voice of America, and Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty as lifelines of reliable information.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Members of this Congress will understand that message as it is enormously important that we do so. Tass has described me as "one of the four enemies of détente." This is not so. I deeply believe in the objectives of détente—but I also believe that it will only succeed if we and the Soviet Union are agreed upon its meaning and implications.

There are hundreds of thousands of Jews waiting for the opportunity to emigrate to Israel. I have the names of 6,000 households of ethnic Germans representing more than 25,000 human beings, who have shown the courage to apply for exit permits, and whose pleas have been ignored. There are hundreds of thousands of others. We will betray their hopes for freedom if we do not determine for ourselves whether Soviet actions match Soviet words, whether the Soviet leadership in fact tells us the truth:

LIST PROVIDED SOVIET MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR BY JAMES L. BUCKLEY IN MOSCOW IN NOVEMBER 1974

I. The following are the names of American residents and of their relatives in Lithuania who are seeking to join them:

1. Sister Bertha Juodvalis, Loretto Hospital, Chicago, Illinois.
2. Brother and sister, both born in the USA: A. Jonas Juodvalis, 45 years, Wife and three children, Kaunas, K. Giedrio 3-51.
3. B. Lauryna Juodvalis Valcekauskienė, Husband Povilas and two children, Kaunas, (26), Vytenio 12-29.
4. 2. Kostas Paulius, 6915 So. Rockwell, Chicago, Illinois. Wife, Dr. Felicitja Lalma, Vilnius Hospital.
5. 3. Aloyzas Jurgutis, Chicago, Illinois. Wife, Marva and 11-year old daughter, Zirmunugve 75, b. 100, Vilnius.
6. 4. Stanley Petrus, Metairie, La. Daughter Aldona Cesnuleviciene, Husband and three children, Vilnius, Angariecio 4-4.
7. 5. Audrone Simonaityte, 7349 So. Maplewood, Mother—Mrs. Simonaitis.
8. 6. Anthony Valentis, 10010 W. 127 Street, Palos Park, Illinois 60464. Brother—Pranas Valantiejus, born 1905, Chicago. Wife Zose, Siauliai, Lenino 32-14.
9. 7. Aloyzas Jurgutis, Chicago. Wife Marai and 11-year old daughter, Vilnius, Lithuania.
10. 8. Nadia Kuzma of Queens, New York City, tells me that she has not seen her son George Kuzma of Lviv, in thirty years. According to Mrs. Kuzma, she has been trying for fifteen years to bring her son and his family to the United States. All papers are said to have been approved by the State Department but the Soviet authorities have not as yet responded.
11. 9. Valentyn Moroz, the Ukrainian historian, is reported to be in Vladimir prison, and according to reports, is near death from heart and gall bladder ailments.
12. 10. Dr. Mikhail Stern who reported he has been in prison since May 29, 1974 and is presently suffering from abdominal internal bleeding. According to the account received, he has not been hospitalized and has not been given any medical attention.
13. 11. Russian dissidents with whom J. L. B. met in Moscow.
14. 12. Dr. and Mrs. Andrei Sakarov, Mrs. Dia Beilin, Dr. and Mrs. Viktor Brailovsky, Dr. Vitaly Rubin, Mr. Vladimir Slepak, Dr. Alexander Luntz, Mr. Elias Essess, Mr. Anatol Schiransky, Professor and Mrs. Mark Azbel, Dr. Alexander Goldfarb, Professor and Mrs. Alexander Lerner, Professor and Mrs. Alexander Voronol, Mrs. Ida Nudel, and Professor and Mrs. Benjamin Levich.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ON SEVERAL PRISONERS

After having received the enclosed list of political prisoners, the Committee for a Free Lithuania has published their names in the national Lithuanian press with a request to inform us, should somebody recognize them as relatives or friends. The Supreme Committee received several letters with additional information which follows.

1. Kadzionis, Jonas: His brother, Mr. A. Kadzionis, of 119 Carrington Street, Bradford Moor, Bradford 3, Yorks, England, born in 1928 in Piktagalial village, Kavarskas county, Ukmerge ralon. Poor health: TB. Married, wife in Lithuania.

2. Rimkus, Jonas: Mr. Kazimieras Rimkus, M.D., of 7200 S. Richmond, Chicago, Illinois, 60629, thinks that Jonas is his brother, born, however, not in 1916 as indicated in the list, but in 1919, in Juozapava, Svedasai, Rokiskis ralon. Father's name is Juozas. His entire family was deported to Siberia, near Altay, closest city Benuil. "In 1962 my brother Jonas was arrested and sentenced to concentration camp," for "mistakes of young days."

3. Budreika Stasys: the same Mr. Kazimieras Rimkus thinks that Budreika Stasys may be his relative. Stasys was born, according to Mr. Rimkus, in 1914 in Gyklai, Svedasai county, Rokiskis ralon. His father's name is Antanas.

4. Dudenas Mykolas: Mr. V. Dudenas of W212 N5420 Kenmore Dr., Menomonee Falls, Wisc. 53051, thinks that Mykolas is his uncle, born in 1910 in Linkmenys, Svecionys ralon. His parents are Justinas and Veronika (nee Pelenyte) Dudenas, both dead. There is a sister, Mrs. Veronika Bileislene, Linkmenu past, Ignalina ralon, Lithuanian; brother Kazys Dudenas, 6857 S. Campbell Avenue, Chicago, Ill. 60629. His present address is: SSSR, Moskva, Ychrezhdnyye 5110/1 BC, Dudenas Mykolas.

5. Miltastunas Jonas. Mr. Jonas V. Simkus of 1014 Royal York Rd., Toronto, Ontario, Canada, MBX 264, thinks that Jonas Miltastunas is his school friend, born in 1922 in Trunkunai, Panevazys ralon. From 1941 to fall of 1943 attended Vilnius University.

TELEPHONE DISCONNECTION

In addition to the more than forty telephones disconnected since May, nine more phones were disconnected in the past two days. Many calls made to the Soviet Union in the past two weeks have not been completed. Moreover, activists have had to arrange to receive incoming calls not only from other apartments, but they have to find places in suburban areas often as fast as two hours away from their homes.

PARTIAL LIST OF RECENT HARASSMENTS

Name, city, and date

Azbel, Mark, Moscow, Mid-October: Wife questioned by Moscow police as to whereabouts of her husband. Azbel has been threatened with prosecution on the charges of "parasitism."

Prisoners of Conscience—Perm and Potma, October: Camp conditions have deteriorated. Prisoners of Conscience are being transferred from one camp to another in an effort to further isolate them. They also face harsher conditions in the new camps.

Zalmanson, Izrail, Potma Prison No. 3, October 28: Not allowed his regulation visiting rights. Relatives denied permission to see him. Put in solitary confinement for 15 days.

Penson, Boris, Potma Prison No. 3, October 28: Visiting rights revoked. In answering Penson's mother's appeal, the Head of Prison Camp Administration claimed that Penson had "broken camp rules." Was also transferred to Camp No. 3 to further isolate him.

Butman, Hillel, Perm Prison, October 28: Placed in solitary confinement for the second time in the last few months.

Azernikov, Boris, Potma, October 29: Transferred to Camp #3 in an attempt to further isolate the prisoner. Also sentenced to six months in solitary confinement for protesting non-delivery of mail.

Silnitsky, Aleksandr, Krasnodar, October 18: After applying for a visa to Israel, Silnitsky received a summons to report for military service. Refused to comply with order.

Roitburd, Lev, Odessa, October 16-20: Search carried out in his home by Soviet authorities. Materials of Jewish content were confiscated. Roitburd's wife was summoned the following day to police headquarters for interrogation and accused of speculation in the black market. Roitburd refused to appear for interrogation as ordered. Two of Roitburd's friends were summoned as well to testify against him and his wife. They refused to comply with the order.

Rubin, Vitaly, Moscow, September: Prosecution on charges of "parasitism" pending. Vainman, Leonid, Ukrainian Prison, October 18: In response to his request that he be allowed to apply for formal renunciation of his Soviet citizenship, a meeting was called by Camp authorities in which Vainman was abused and a suggestion made that he be castrated. Vainman is serving a four year term.

Kutchuk, Yechiel, Kishinev, October 24: Sentenced to ten years imprisonment with an additional three years in exile. Kutchuk and his wife were about to leave the Soviet Union for Israel when their visas were taken from them. Kutchuk was charged with unspecified economic crimes.

Voronel, Aleksandr, Moscow, October 11: Under constant surveillance, now in hiding outside of Moscow. His whereabouts are unknown. The Voronel apartment has been cordoned off by Soviet police. Voronel's wife cannot leave the apartment. Since the cancellation of the scientific seminar in May, Voronel has been under the constant threat of being charged with "parasitism."

Tartakovsky, Yuli, Kiev, October 21: Apartment broken into by KGB with extensive damage of furniture and instruments and the confiscation of documents. Tartakovsky has been under constant surveillance for the past few weeks. Has been summoned by the draft board for military service but refuses to comply with the order.

Kislik, Vladimir, Kiev, Mid-October: Severely beaten for a second time within a month. Planned to participate in a demonstration on October 18 marking the first anniversary of the Feldman trial. Kislik and his attackers were given fifteen day sentences after police intervention.

Shtern, Mikhail (Dr.), Vinnitsa: Was first arrested in May on charges of accepting bribes. The charge was subsequently dropped for lack of sufficient evidence. He was recently taken to custody again for allegedly "attempting to poison his patients, among them children." He is expected to go on trial at the end of the month. The Shtern family has been systematically harassed and persecuted by Soviet authorities since first applying for a visa in May 1973. People living in neighboring villages who are former patients are being pressured to sign documents giving false testimony.

Altman, Anatoly, Perm Prison No. 35, October 28: Denied medical treatment for leg ailment. A package sent to Altman containing medicine for his condition was denied him.

Khokh, Leib, Altman, Anatoly, Yagman, Lev, Perm Prison No. 35, October 4: Because conditions in Perm Camp No. 35 have become so bad, Khokh, Yagman and Altman have written out their last wills and testaments. They feel that should these conditions continue they will not be able to survive much longer.

Frolov, Oleg, Riazin, October 4: After serving his five year sentence in Perm Prison Camp, Frolov was released and has been placed under constant surveillance for a twelve month period by local authorities in Riazin.

Zalmanson, Vulf, Perm No. 36, October 11: Has had his visiting rights cancelled and given a one year punishment.

Korenblit, Mikhail, Potma, October 29: Transferred to Camp No. 19 in an attempt to further isolate him.

Kaminsky, Lassal, Potma, October 29: Transferred to Camp No. 19 in an attempt to further isolate him.

Aleksel, Targonsky and Leonid, Tsypin, Moscow, October 18: Held a press conference on October 18 with correspondents of Associated Press and Reuters. On their separate ways home, both were attacked by groups of unidentified men. Tsypin was knocked unconscious and a bag containing letters and photographs from his wife in Israel was stolen. Upon reporting the incident to the officer in charge in the militia station, Tsypin was laughed at and told that the incident had been a figment of his imagination.

LITHUANIAN POLITICAL PRISONERS IN SOVIET CAMPS, JAILS AND UNDER HOUSE ARREST

The 41 names below represent but a small fraction of the total number of the Lithuanian political prisoners.

1. Jonas Zilinskas, Potma concentration camp in Mordovia.

2. A. Jastrauskas, ditto.

3. Julijonas Steponavicius, Bishop of Panevezys, Apostolic Administrator of Vilnius, under house arrest since 1961, when he was relieved of his duties.

4. Vicentas Sladkevicius, 53, Auxiliary Bishop of Kaistadorys, under house arrest. (These Lithuanian youths (No. 5 to No. 11) were tried on September 25, 1972, and accused of participating in mass demonstration, demanding freedom for Lithuania. The demonstrations were caused by self-immolation of Romas Kalanta on May 14, 1972, in Kaunas, and his subsequent secret burial by the police.

5. Vytautas Kalade, 3 years of prison.

6. Antanas Kucinskas, 3 years of prison.

7. Kazys Grinkevicius, 2 years of prison.

8. Vytautas Zmuda, 2 years of prison.

9. Rimas Bauzys, 18 months of prison.

10. Virginija Urbonaviciute, 1 year of concentration camp.

11. Richardas Truskauskas, 10 years of forced labor.

12. Ruta Januseviciute, arrested May 13, 1973 in Kaunas.

13. Vidimantas Povilonis, arrested in March 1973 in Kaunas.

14. Antanas Sakalauskas, arrested in March 1973 in Kaunas.

15. Sarunas Zukauskas, arrested in March 1973 in Kaunas.

16. Izidorius Rudaitis, M.D., arrested, sentenced to 3 years.

17. Donatas Butkus, was sentenced for studying Buddhism, in Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan.

These (No. 18 to No. 24) all are participants in the anti-Soviet guerrilla war in Lithuania during 1942-1952. They all are inmates of the concentration camp "Uchrezhdenia ZK 885/17-a", poselok Ozeroye, Republic of Mordva (Mordovskaya Respublika.).

18. Paulaitis.

19. Petras Paltarokas.

20. Balys Gajauskas.

21. K. Kavaliauskas.

22. B. Pupelis.

23. I. Steikunas.

24. K. Sirvis.

They (No. 25 to No. 32) are all Jehovah's Witnesses tried and imprisoned by Soviet court in Klaipeda, Lithuania, in March 1972, for practicing their religion.

25. V. Arajus, five years of heavy labor prison.

26. T. Serelis, five years of heavy labor prison.

27. J. Susys, five years of heavy labor prison.

28. Pr. Babonas, five years of heavy labor prison.

29. V. Anusis, two years prison.

30. A. Kukutis, two years prison.

31. Miss E. Krauzaitis, 2.5 years loss of freedom.

32. K. Velskiene (Mrs.).

33. Vytautas Simokaitis, 34, was sentenced to death on January 19, 1971, in Vilnius, Lithuania for an attempt to escape to freedom by diverting the Soviet plane from Vilnius to Scandinavia.

34. Grazhina Simokaitis, Mrs., wife of Vytautas Simokaitis for the same offense sentenced to 3 years of hard labor (she was pregnant at that time).

35. Algis Statkevicius, arrested for having written "Critique of Communist Manifesto." Sentenced to psychiatric hospital.

36. Juozas Tumajalis, sentenced to concentration camp.

37. Liudvikas Simutis, sentenced to death in 1955 for being a partisan, sentence commuted to 25 years. At present in the camp P/O Javaz, ZX 385/10 heavy labor camp.

38. Antanas Dumbilauskas, Jesuit priest, arrested.

39. Pranas Kriksciunas, in psychiatric clinic. Vilnius, M.T.P.-4, P/d. 12/11, Lith? uania.

THE RETIREMENT OF JERRY VERKLER

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to call to the attention of my colleagues the retirement of Jerry Verkler, after 14 years as staff director of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

As a Member of the other body, I first met Jerry when he was legislative assistant to Senator Clinton Anderson of New Mexico. His appointment as staff director of the Senate Interior Committee came at about the same time I first joined that committee in 1961.

During the intervening years, I have worked closely with Jerry and have come to depend on him for advice and counsel in the public interest in our public lands.

I am not alone in this regard. Last year Jerry received one of the highest honors in the conservation movement—the American Motors Conservation Award. This tribute to Jerry was noted by the distinguished junior Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) volume 119, part 19, page 24873, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

That tribute, however, did not include the citation, which I call to your attention. It includes these words:

Mr. Verkler has been a dedicated worker in the cause of conservation for more than a decade. He has given able guidance to members of the Senate Committee in development of such legislation as the landmark bill establishing the Council on Environmental Quality in the Office of the President, and the series of actions establishing additional national parks, monuments and national seashores. He was a key participant in the five years of work which led to passage of the Wilderness Act of 1964, setting aside 20 million acres of wilderness lands.

I have had a chance to talk with Jerry recently. He takes pride in his close work with the senior Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE) on most of the major national park accomplishments since 1961. He regards as his greatest accomplishment the Land and Water Conservation Fund. His hope, as he retires, is a modernization of the public land laws, especially the Bureau of Land Management Organic Act.

As he said the other day:

But we've started—and the tough ones take time. If I've accomplished anything, it is that I may have helped the Committee with the legislation it has passed in the last dozen or so years, with a small, busy, and pretty effective staff.

I agree with Jerry. Those who disagree with him will also disagree with me. He has made an effective contribution to the working of our Government. I wish him well in retirement.

FRANCIS SALVADORE

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, December 19 is a date of significance for all those Americans who love liberty and all those people who revere religious freedom. This year we celebrate the bicentennial of the election of Francis Salvatore to South Carolina's First Provincial Congress. On December 19, 1774, Francis Salvatore, a recent immigrant, an English Jew of education and wealth, was elected by the District of Ninety Six to South Carolina's First Provincial Congress which was to be held in Charleston. Francis Salvatore was the first member of the Jewish faith elected to a parliamentary body in the western world. In November 1773, he arrived in Charleston and settled on the South Carolina frontier near the community of Ninety Six. His family had owned the land for 20 years. He called his home "Coranoca."

In January 1775, Francis Salvatore took his seat in the First Provincial Congress which met in the Exchange Building which still stands. Re-elected a member of South Carolina's Second Provincial Congress in 1776, he was appointed with Col. Charles Coatsworth Pinckney as a member of a subcommittee to review the wording of the new proposed constitution for South Carolina. In July 1776, he served as a volunteer on the Carolina frontier and defended his home from an attack of the Cherokee Indians. The Cherokees were then in alliance with the English King and under the dominance of the King George III's agent to the Indian Nations, John Stuart. As a matter of interest John Stuart's home has survived the terrors of war and remains a handsome home a block from the Charleston Battery. On August 1, 1776, Francis Salvatore while serving as a volunteer with Colonel Williamson's Command was wounded at the Battle of Seneca. A few hours later he died at the age of 29, having been scalped by the Indians. "Thus perished one whose future was full of promise to himself and to the young republic." He was the first member of the Jewish faith to give his life in the cause of American independence.

South Carolina is proud of its heritage. It is justly proud also of all those men who came from other lands and other colonies to save her from British tyranny and to fight for her and America. They were gallant soldiers, many bled and some gave their lives on the altar of freedom so that this Nation could be independent and free.

In 1973, the 100th General Assembly of South Carolina and the South Carolina American Revolution Bicentennial Commission passed a resolution asking for commemorative stamps in memory of five of the great heroes of the Revolution. It was introduced by the 124 members of the South Carolina House of Representatives, each member being a sponsor.

The resolution asked for commemorative stamps in honor of Francis Salvadore; Francis Marion, the famous "Swamp Fox" of the Revolution, a French Huguenot and a South Carolinian—17 States have a county named in his honor; Sgt. William Jasper, the most famous enlisted man of the Revolution, a hero of Fort Moultrie and Savannah, where he was killed raising the flag of his regiment—8 States have a county named in his honor; Count Pulaski, a Roman Catholic, who came from Poland, fought valiantly in the Revolution for this country and gave his life at Savannah—7 States have a county named in his honor; and Baron De Kalb of Germany who landed on the South Carolina coast in 1777 with LaFayette, offered his services to the Nation and died a hero's death at Camden in 1780—6 States have a county named in his honor.

Of these five heroes only one survived the Revolution, the legendary Francis Marion, courageous in battle, magnanimous in victory. The other four gave their lives for this Nation. It is my hope that my colleagues in the Senate and in the House of Representatives will join with me in asking the U.S. Postal Service to issue stamps in memory of these five patriotic Americans. Their example of patriotism and self-sacrifice should inspire us all.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, approved unanimously by the South Carolina General Assembly, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION—EXPRESSING SUPPORT FOR THE ISSUANCE OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMPS IN HONOR OF GENERAL FRANCIS MARION, SERGEANT JASPER, COUNT PULASKI, BARON DE KALB AND FRANCIS SALVADORE

Whereas, the South Carolina Bicentennial Commission of the American Revolution has passed a resolution expressing support for the issuance of commemorative stamps in honor of five great heroes of the Revolution; four of whom gave their lives in the cause of freedom; only Francis Marion, the legendary Swamp Fox, survived the war; the others being Sergeant Jasper, Count Pulaski, Baron De Kalb and Francis Salvatore; and

Whereas, the General Assembly of South Carolina favors the issuance of commemorative stamps in the Bicentennial Era in honor of the heroes and heroines of the Revolution and major events in the history of the founding of the nation; and

Whereas, the General Assembly of South Carolina would like to express its support for the resolution which reads as follows:

"A resolution reaffirming support for the issuance of a commemorative postage stamp in honor of General Francis Marion of the Revolution and the issuance of commemorative stamps in honor of Francis Salvatore, Count Pulaski, Baron De Kalb and Sergeant Jasper."

Whereas, the South Carolina American Revolution Bicentennial Commission has already passed a resolution that a commemorative postage stamp be issued in honor of the legendary General Francis Marion, the Swamp Fox, one of the most famous patriots in the Revolution. The issuance of such a stamp would be in the national interest. More counties commemorate Marion's memory than any other American military hero of the Revolution except George Washington. Seventeen states have a county named in honor of Francis Marion. An authentic hero of the American Revolution, from the time of

Parson Weems and William Cullen Bryant to Archibald Rutledge and Walt Disney, Francis Marion has been a part of our national heritage, a legend of the land; and

Whereas, it has come to the attention of the Commission that some of the heroes of the American Revolution are identified in the public mind with their ethnic or national origin; and

Whereas, among these heroes are the gallant Marquis de Lafayette of France and General Thaddeus Kosciuszko, the Polish patriot, both are famous and they have had commemorative stamps issued in their memory in recent years while others equally deserving have not been so honored, such as General Baron De Kalb of Germany, Count Pulaski of Poland, Francis Salvador, an English Jew who came to South Carolina and gave his life for America, and Sergeant Jasper who came from Ireland and gave his life in the attack on Savannah, Georgia; and

Whereas, Francis Salvatore, who was educated in England, but moved to South Carolina shortly before the American Revolution, was the first member of the Jewish faith to be elected to a parliamentary body in the western world, being elected to South Carolina's first legislature in 1775 and during the same year he was the first member of the Jewish faith to give his life for American independence; and

Whereas, Count Pulaski, a native of Poland, offered his services to America, fought on the soil of many states, including South Carolina, and gave his life for America in the attack of the British position at Savannah, Georgia, in 1779. Counties in seven states honor his memory; and

Whereas, Major General Baron De Kalb, a native of Germany came with Lafayette in 1777, landed on the coast of South Carolina, and offered his services to the young nation, which he served with conspicuous gallantry, giving his life for America at the Battle of Camden. He died at the age of 58 after receiving eleven wounds. He was a bright star in a sad and tragic defeat. Counties in six states honor his memory; and

Whereas, Sergeant William Jasper, the most famous enlisted man in the Revolution, the hero of Fort Moultrie and Savannah, was from Ireland. Counties in eight states are named in his honor.

Now, therefore be it resolved, By the South Carolina American Revolution Bicentennial Commission, that it go on record as reaffirming its support for the issuance of a commemorative postage stamp in honor of General Francis Marion and that it does further request that commemorative postage stamps be issued in honor of Francis Salvatore, Count Pulaski, Baron De Kalb and Sergeant William Jasper.

Be it further resolved, That it is requested that consideration be given to the first day cover for the Francis Marion stamp to be in each of the seventeen counties in the seventeen states named in his honor, and in Berkeley County where he was born, and in Florence County where Francis Marion College is located; and that the first day cover for Francis Salvatore be at Ninety-six, South Carolina, which bears the name of the district he represented in the South Carolina Legislature and is the site of the famous Revolutionary Battle where Star Fort is presently being restored and in Washington, D.C., such a stamp would commemorate our Country's religious liberty and individual freedom; that the stamp in honor of Count Pulaski have its first day issue in Savannah, Georgia, where he gave his life, and in the seven counties named in his honor; that the stamp issued in honor of Baron De Kalb have its first day issue in Camden, South Carolina, where he gave his life, and the six counties named in his honor, including Dekalb County, Georgia, which includes part of Atlanta, and the stamp in honor of Sergeant Jasper be issued in Charleston, South Carolina, and Savannah, Georgia, and in the eight counties named in his honor. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution be mailed to the Postmaster General of the United States and to the Chairman of the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D.C. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring:

That it go on record in favor of the resolution of the South Carolina Bicentennial Commission on the American Revolution calling for the issuance of commemorative stamps in honor of General Francis Marion, Sergeant William Jasper, Count Pulaski, Baron De Kalb and Francis Salvador. Be it further

Resolved that the legislatures of the other forty-nine states, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the territories be asked to join in sponsoring this resolution. Be it further

Resolved that a copy of this resolution be mailed to the Postmaster General of the United States, the Chairman of the National Bicentennial Commission of the American Revolution and the members of the South Carolina Congressional Delegation.

U.N. CONTEMPLATES CENSORSHIP

Mr. PROXMIER. Mr. President, the free flow of ideas—a building block of our American democracy—apparently is not the ideal of many member countries in the United Nations.

Roscoe Drummond, writing in the Christian Science Monitor of December 18, warns that if a coalition of Communist and third-world countries gets its way, international satellite television broadcasts will be censored. His warning should be heeded.

How will our delegation to the U.N. react when the proposed international treaty on such broadcasts comes up in the General Assembly?

I would hope that Ambassador John Scali, a distinguished former newsmen, will have a hand in setting U.S. policy on this issue. The United States should do all that it can to block such an anti-democratic treaty.

But, we must remember that our own domestic broadcasting policies have led to control of the airwaves, in a way that I believe violates the first amendment to the Constitution.

True, the Federal Communications Commission is not in the censorship business. It exercises no prior restraint over programming. But, the FCC so-called fairness doctrine does impose an atmosphere that makes broadcasters think twice before airing controversial issues.

Only yesterday, it was announced that the entire nine-judge U.S. Court of Appeals had agreed to reconsider whether the NBC television documentary, "Pensions: The Broken Promise," violated the fairness doctrine.

That was a prize-winning program that was on the network before the Congress voted legislation to correct the abuses in private pension systems reviewed on that program.

A group called Accuracy in Media challenged the fairness of that NBC presentation. The subject matter was important. It had never been dealt with before on network television. Partisan politics was not involved. The national security was not involved. Yet, an investigative journalistic endeavor, which would have clearly been protected under the first amendment had it appeared in a newspaper, magazine, or book, was attacked. And the abuses were corrected by Congress, which had already begun its work.

Admittedly, that is a quick review of a case, in which a three-judge appeals court panel found in favor of investigative journalism and the first amendment. Yet, can you imagine the uproar that any international satellite broadcast—any broadcast—will raise should that treaty come into force.

Maybe we need to see such an uproar on the international scene to appreciate the aberration we have allowed to develop in our own country with the governmental regulation of broadcasting.

The Congress of the United States will have the opportunity next year to look at the fairness doctrine, for I plan to introduce legislation to eliminate it along with other controls on broadcasting. I hope that the international satellite proposal, so clearly inimical to democracy, can be translated to action to free our own broadcasters so that they can be of greater service as a communications media to our citizens.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the column of Mr. Drummond be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CREEPING GLOBAL CENSORSHIP (By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—In recent weeks the General Assembly of the United Nations has put through a series of actions—already reported—which bend, if, indeed, they do not break, the spirit and letter of the UN Charter. If continued, they would imperil its survival.

It looks as though they were continuing. It is now evident that the same coalition of Communist, Arab, African, and third-world states has additional plans—and they are ominous.

Bear in mind that in a few years satellite television will be able to carry news, ideas, and information everywhere on the planet so that any person with a home set in any country can get clear images and a daily profile of what is going on in every other country.

But this coalition of Communist and third-world countries doesn't want it that way. So what are they doing? They are ordering up an international treaty for early next year to put the authority of the UN behind a worldwide censorship.

Several drafts of such a treaty have already been written and their objective is to enable any nation anywhere to impose over a large area of the world a prior censorship on anything and everything in satellite television which it deems censorable—not only from its own citizens but from peoples in neighboring countries.

For example, if Kenya or Poland should decide they want to keep their countries from seeing a Shakespearean play or a controversial UN debate, they would be blacking them out not only for themselves but for most of Central Africa and Eastern Europe.

Let's not pretend. It is perfectly evident what these nations are after—and at this point it looks as though they have the votes to get what they want. They want to drape the mantle of UN moral authority around the worst kind of political censorship.

And what they are trying to do is to imbed in a treaty a violation of a commitment under the UN Charter. I quote Article 19 from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted and proclaimed by the General Assembly on Nov. 10, 1948:

"Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers."

Some governments may wish they had never signed this declaration and may have no intention of living up to it. But should the UN be willing to authorize its violation?

Obviously the new technology of satellite television should be used constructively and sensitively. Those who have the means to use it must respect the culture and customs of those peoples to whom it is available.

But that is not what the would-be censors are really concerned about. They want to hold their people in intellectual bondage and bar them from knowing very much about what is being said and thought elsewhere in the world.

I propose a test. Let's agree that first experiments with worldwide satellite television will be only to report live and verbatim the major debates of the United Nations.

Will those who want to censor satellite television permit these debates to be televised worldwide? Let's find out.

Yes, one man's truth is another man's propaganda. So if the UN is to authorize the censorship of propaganda, it will erect in effect a massively increased barrier to the free flow of ideas in clear violation of the UN's own "Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

Internal censorship is bad enough, but should one nation be given the right to censor what the peoples of neighboring nations can hear and see?

When the Soviet Union first presented this kind of treaty to a UNESCO meeting in Paris, its delegate wanted to see his country free to "shoot down" such an orbiting TV satellite "as though it were a spy."

What a travesty that the UN should even be asked to treat the imparting of "information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers" as though it were gathering intelligence rather than spreading it!

The next step to get such a treaty will come at the UN in February.

THE LIFELINE ELECTRIC RATE

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, one of the inequities in our utility regulatory system is the rate structure. Residential consumers often pay two or three times more for their electricity than do large industrial concerns.

There are sound arguments for rate restructuring. Industrial and large commercial users are primarily responsible for increase in demand and, therefore, additional plant capacity. Their low rates discourage conservation. The social cost of electric power used by industry is extremely high when the industry is a major polluter. This important factor is, unfortunately, seldom considered in rate design. On the other hand, cost of service for basic electric needs to low-income rate payers in densely settled areas is often a fraction of the cost to the large industrial concerns which are subsidized by the low-income residential users.

Fortunately, several of the State public service commissions are recognizing inequity and restructuring rates.

One is the Michigan commission, whose chairman likened the typical rate structure to "allowing a Cadillac owner to pay 26 cents for gasoline, while requiring a Volkswagen owner to pay 41 cents." Others are Wisconsin and North Carolina. Vermont and a number of other States' efforts are under way to obtain, either by legislation or regulation, rate restructuring which will provide 400 kilowatt hours of electricity per month for $10, or some similar small amount of electricity for a set payment.

Millions of pensioners and other low-income persons face a grim winter because of escalating fuel prices. Adoption of the Lifeline rate would be of great assistance to them. It might also provide an incentive, now lacking, for utilities to pay more attention to their fuel costs which they casually pass on via automatic adjustment clauses.

The November 1 issue of the Northern Virginia Sun carried an excellent article, "A Lifeline Plug." The October 11 issue of the Charlotte, N.C. Observer carried an account, by Jack Horan, of a decision by the North Carolina Utilities Commission which took a long step toward the Lifeline rate. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial and article be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer, Oct. 11, 1974]
POWER TO COST "LITTLE MAN LESS, INDUSTRY MORE"

(By Jack Horan)

More than a half-million homeowners who consume low or moderate amounts of electricity in Piedmont, North Carolina will pay a dollar or two less a month to Duke Power, while the bills of large industries will jump by more than 25 per cent.

That was the effect of a precedent-setting decision Thursday by the N.C. Utilities Commission.

The residential rate decrease was aimed at encouraging conservation of electricity and helping the poor and the elderly on fixed incomes as well as the hard-pinched middle class served by Duke Power Co. in North Carolina.

The reductions will be on bills sent to households that are considered low and moderate users of electricity.

The commission Thursday granted Duke all of a requested 16.8-per-cent rate increase and shifted the burden of paying it to Duke's industrial customers.

Industries were hit with increases of 26 and 27 per cent. They have historically paid less than their proportionate share of the cost of producing electricity, compared to residential and business customers, according to commission testimony.

The dramatic increase in industrial rates climaxed a two-year effort by the commission to compel Duke to price its electricity so none of its N.C. customers, whether a Charlotte home-owner or a Concord textile plant, was subsidizing the others.

Duke received all the $61 million that it had asked for when it filed the rate request 13 months ago. A statement by president Carl Horn Jr. termed the decision "... sound. We asked only for what we needed based on the economic situation of last year. ..."

Horn said that Duke planned to file soon for a new rate increase.

The utilities commission allowed Duke to continue passing along the increased price of coal in the so-called "coal-cost adjustment charge". But it threw out a second, pending 16.6 per cent rate increase, in effect telling Duke not to file new rate requests until the commission has finished with the earlier one.

Not directly affected by the rate order is Duke's 16.8 per cent request still pending before the S.C. Public Service Commission.

Abney A. Smith, chairman of the S.C. commissions, expressed interest in what the N.C. commission had done. He said, however, that the reduction of rates for residential customers and the steep increase for industry will have no bearing on the S.C. case.

Duke also has a companion 16.6 per cent request backed up behind the 16.8 per cent case in South Carolina.

N.C. Commissioner Tenney L. Deane of Charlotte said the unanimous order shows the commissioners consider the "little man" when it is weighing multimillion-dollar rate cases.

"Most people don't think the commission is sensitive to people," Deane said, noting there was a repeated public plea to hold electric rates down. "I think it's being responsible to the consuming public and to the company."

Deane said several alternate rate schedules, including one that would put a surcharge on the price of electricity for people who run air-conditioners during peak demand periods in the summer, were rejected.

Nonetheless, he said, part of the reason for dropping the price of electricity in the low-use and medium-use brackets and to increase it in the upper-use brackets was to encourage another dollar of increase is energy conservation.

"I think the thrust of it," Deane said, "is to provide relief to those people for whom greater in proportion than what they earn..."

The commissioners sharply criticized Duke for several of its operating practices and urged cost-cutting.

"After having carefully considered the current economic environment..." the order said, "we conclude that Duke should begin immediately to institute the most careful review of its entire operating budget to effect and carry out savings..."

Specifically noted was that former president W. B. McGuire is receiving a $75,000-a-year consultant's salary deemed "excessive and not justified."

Duke should eliminate its so-called institutional advertising, the commissioners said. North Carolina's other major electric utility, Carolina Power & Light Co., has a 21 per cent increase pending before the commission.

Deane hinted that the commission might order reductions for CP&L's low-use and medium-use customers.

"If this is a workable solution to the problem, then probably we could employ some similar thinking," he said.

[From the Northern Virginia Sun, Nov. 1, 1974]

AN EDITORIAL—A LIFELINE PLUG

Whether Virginia Electric and Power Co. deserves to raise electric rates is a complex question on which even experts disagree.

But the hearings to be held next spring on VEPCO's request for a permanent increase in rates offer the opportunity to rationalize the rate structure in a way that makes sense.

Back in the days of coal-oil lamps and wood-fired stoves, electricity wasn't a necessity. Today it is. The nation's health and welfare depend on the availability of electricity. For many not only the availability of electricity is essential. It must be available at a cost low enough for them to afford.

Increases are boosting the cost of electricity at such an alarming rate that it may soon be impossible for some families to afford it.

The State Corporation Commission has the power to set rates for VEPCO must consider the public's need for an essential service at affordable rates. It should scrap traditional rate formulas that permit large electric users to purchase power at discount rates.

Today the average VEPCO residential customer pays a rate per kilowatt-hour that is double that of industrial users. These discount rates act as an incentive for industrial users to hog electricity and waste it.

Even residential customers who use large amounts of electricity get rate breaks. A VEPCO residential customer who used only 100 kilowatt hours in July paid a basic rate of $5.42, according to a table sent out by the electric company last month. That figures out to be 5.4 cents per kilowatt-hour. A juice guzzling neighbor who used 2,000 kilowatt hours of electricity paid only 2.6 cents per kilowatt-hour that month.

Instead of rewarding conservation in this age of inflation and dwindling resources, we foolishly continue to prize gluttonous behavior. Thus the wasteful industrial user is subsidized by the residential customer and the wasteful residential customer is subsidized by frugal neighbors.

The rate structure needs to be changed to reflect human need and to encourage conservation. The best way to do this is to institute what has become known as a lifeline rate. This will permit a basic minimum of electricity to be purchased cheaply and at a rate that remains constant throughout inflationary buffeting.

Experts say that the minimum amount of electricity needed to maintain a household's health and welfare is about 400 kilowatt hours. Using 1972 as a base year and the average price paid by all VEPCO customers that year as a fair rate, 400 kilowatt hours of lifeline power would cost $6.96. That is about half the price it would cost under today's discriminatory rate structure.

Of course it will be necessary to raise rates paid by large users. Studies have shown they are largely responsible for the need to increase rates.

Some public utility commissions have already seen the light. In Michigan, for instance, users of 500 kilowatt hours or less received a rate reduction last year. Industrial and commercial users were hit with a $20 million increase.

The chairman of the Michigan commission likened the old rate structure, similar to the one now used in Virginia, to "allowing a Cadillac owner to pay 26 cents for gasoline, while requiring a Volkswagen owner to pay 41 cents."

The beauty of the lifeline rate concept is that it acknowledges electricity as a human need in a way that is financially helpful. Yet it is not a welfare program either. It presents a chance for Virginia to be among the first to fight the wasteful consumption that lies at the heart of our nation's most distressing crisis.

ADEQUATE FOOD SUPPLIES AND U.S. AGRICULTURAL POLICIES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on December 10 and 12 hearings were held by the Subcommittees on Foreign Agricultural Policy and Agricultural Production, Marketing and Stabilization of Prices of the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee. These hearings reviewed the U.S. food situation and food aid demands.

I would like to call your attention to the statement of Mr. Robert G. Lewis of the National Farmers Union which points out that our present agricultural policies are totally inadequate and are clearly set to encourage "boom and bust, glut or famine."

December 19, 1974

A special problem is the fact that the 1975 price supports have been set so low—33 percent of parity for wheat and 40 percent of parity for feed grains—that farmers will be unable to survive if crop production returns to normal during the coming year.

As an example, if 78 million acres of wheat are planted and yields per acre reach 33.9 bushels we will have a total harvest of almost 2.7 billion bushels. This level of production would likely lead to a glut on the market.

Mr. Lewis correctly asks: Why does the U.S.A. undermine and handicap her pre-eminent food power? Why do we try to depress the prices and discourage the producers of our most effective asset in international trade, in world politics, even in national security?

I think this statement makes a very convincing case as to why our agricultural policies are in need of revision, and I commend it to the attention of this body.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ROBERT G. LEWIS, NATIONAL SECRETARY OF THE FARMERS UNION

Today's world food shortage was made in Washington in 1971 and 1972 with depression-level grain prices for U.S. farmers.

If grain prices had been supported at parity, American farmers could easily have produced enough food to prevent today's starvation.

Unfortunately, the Administration is continuing the same "boom and bust, glut or famine" policies that got us into our present trouble. This is sure to perpetuate insecurity in the world's food supply. It is also creating shortages of meat and milk for consumers right here in the U.S.A.

The point of this historical review is what it can teach us about dealing with our present problems. We ought to avoid repeating the mistakes that led to the present shortages and disruptions and distortions in our domestic agricultural industry, our own food supplies, in our commercial export markets, and in our food and opportunities and obligations.

I am submitting for the record the report of a recent study by Farmers Union economists which shows the changing course of our Food for Peace program operations since their initiation 20 years ago. This report demonstrates that the U.S. has had ample unused food producing capability to have provided sufficient stocks to meet the current needs. Indeed, the World Food Conference in Rome last month placed the needs for the hunger emergencies at about 7½ million tons. In both 1973 and 1972, land sufficient to have produced far more grain than the quantity now needed was held out of production under government programs.

It should be emphasized that much of the withheld crop land would not have been returned to production in the absence of the set-aside program. The low prices that prevailed in those years, because of the extremely low levels of price support, prohibited farmers from cropping much of that land. It is low prices that has been the main contributing force to today's food shortage.

Unfortunately, the Administration has not seen fit to correct this basic cause of food shortage.

The Administration last week announced the lowest levels of price supports for grain crops since farm commodity programs were begun 40 years ago. This is a sure-fire prescription for a calamitous "bust" in farm prices in 1975. That will be followed by even worse shortages of food than at present a year or so from now.

Milk and livestock prices are already down so low that thousands of producers are going out of business and shortages are close ahead.

The price support loan rate just announced for wheat in 1975 is only 33 percent of parity. It's only 40 percent for feed grains. Farmers can never survive if crop production returns to normal around the world next year, and prices drop to these low floors. They are even worse than the depression-level prices in 1970 and 1971 and 1972 that reduced harvested acreage in the United States to the lowest point since the 1890's, and created today's world food shortage.

If we have good weather next year, we are sure to have huge temporary surpluses of grain, forcing prices down to the support floors. But when the surpluses are gone, thousands of family farmers will be gone too, and then consumers will be in for another round of famine.

Francis Gomme of USDA's Economic Research Service is quoted in today's New York Times as forecasting the winter wheat acreage planted for the 1975 crop at 72 million, up from 70 million this year. But he said others are forecasting acreages "as high as 75 to 78 million."

This acreage will produce an enormous all-time record crop if yields are even at this year's below-trend level of 28 bushels per acre. If the U.S. wheat yield returns to the recent trend at about 35 bushels per acre, the size of the 1975 wheat crop will be staggering. Here are some comparisons:

1974—Actual (record crop)—70 million acres: 1,781 billion bushels;

1975—Projected 78 million acres @ actual 1974 yield of 27.8 bu./acre (lowest since 1967): 2,168 billion bushels;

Projected 78 million acres @ previous record yield of 33.9 bu./acre in 1971: 2,678 billion bushels;

Projected 78 million acres @ trend yield of 35 bu./acre: 2,730 billion bushels.

Any wheat crop that is at all probable from the probable planted acreage for 1975 harvest, if crop conditions are normal for wheat and other grains throughout most of the world, is certain to create a staggering surplus and collapsing grain prices and financial disaster for American grain producers.

It is neither equitable, nor in the long-run practical, for the U.S. to conduct its food and agricultural policies on such a reckless and unstable course as is now the case.

Our livestock, dairy, and poultry industries are already casualties of the "boom and bust, glut or famine" policy.

Our export markets have been damaged irreversibly by our inability to supply traditional customers dependably. This has given a tremendous impetus to the financing of competing farm production enterprises in other countries.

Ironically, the U.S. government itself is encouraging the oil exporting countries to invest heavily in new farming developments. In terms of world economic power and political influence, this is parallel to the Shah of Iran or the King of Arabia giving to the U.S. financial aid and technical help to develop competing energy sources.

Why does the U.S.A. undermine and handicap her pre-eminent food power? Why do we try to depress the prices and discourage the producers of our most effective asset in international trade, in world politics, even in national security?

This is a thoughtless and poorly-conceived national policy, based on obsolete ideological doctrines and serving only the narrow special interests of the multinational commodity trading companies, who profit from the farmers in times of glut and "bust", and who profit from consumers in times of shortage and hunger.

The Farmers Union recommends that Congress take charge and put a stop to the "boom and bust, glut or famine" approach that created the present food crisis.

Price support loan rates should be raised to 90 percent of parity, with target prices at full parity.

This will assure abundant food supplies at fair and reasonable prices for our own consumers and for our commercial export customers as well as needy people in famine emergencies in other countries.

Our specific proposals for a new and modernized farm and food policy are as follows:

THE FARMERS UNION'S PLAN FOR PARITY AND ABUNDANCE

Following is the plan proposed by the Farmers Union to provide parity for farmers and an assured abundance of agricultural commodities for U.S. consumers and export customers:

1. Non-recourse commodity loans should be offered to farmers at 90% to 100% of parity, to establish the minimum floor under market prices. Stocks of commodities would accumulate in loan status to the extent that supplies were more than sufficient to satisfy the market demand at about the parity price. The producer could sell his commodity at any time during the marketing year by repaying the loan and paying the accumulated interest and storage charges.

2. Farmers should be eligible for price support loans on eligible commodities stored in any approved facility, whether on the farm, in the farmers' cooperative, or in other approved storage facilities.

3. Price support loans should be extended from year-to-year, at the option of the farmer. When a commodity loan is extended, the government should absorb the interest and storage cost for the prior year if the market price of the commodity has not reached 110% of parity.

4. When supplies in the market become short and the market price approaches 110% of parity, farmers would have an incentive to repay their loans and sell their stored commodities so as to avoid incurring the cost of continued storage. But it would not be necessary for the government to "call" loans. The farmer should be permitted to hold his commodity in extended loan status if he wished to absorb the storage and interest costs himself after the price reaches 110% of parity.

5. Commodities owned by the government should not be offered for sale into commercial markets at prices below the higher of the current market price or 115% of parity. If it should be considered necessary in order to assure that ample supplies would move into the market when needed, the Secretary of Agriculture could be authorized to enter into option agreements to buy the commodity from the farmer at a price of 115% of parity during the term of an outstanding initial or extended non-recourse loan. This would provide some flexibility to the government in meeting urgent requirements under exceptional conditions. But it would keep government-owned stocks totally insulated from the market so long as prices are below 115% of parity.

6. Voluntary or mandatory programs to restrain production of major farm commodities should be put into effect at any time that the Secretary of Agriculture determines that carry-over stocks of the commodity is likely to rise above the desired "reserve" level. Price supports should be maintained at 90% to 100% of parity. The minimum reserve should be established by Congress. The Farmers Union recommends that reserves be established at about 50% of the annual requirements for domestic use and exports in the case of food grains, 25% in the case of feed grains, and 35% in the case of cotton.

7. A new import control plan should be established which would eliminate practically all imports of any farm commodity when prices in the U.S. are below parity. A variable rate of duty, equal to the amount by which world market selling prices fall below 115% of parity, should be applied to any farm commodities imported into the U.S.

8. International agreement should be negotiated with other producing and consuming countries to provide for international co-operation to stabilize prices and supplies of agricultural commodities, particularly grains, dairy products, cotton, and sugar, through one or more of the following provisions:

(a) minimum and maximum prices in world trade (the Farmers Union proposes a range of prices between 90% and 110% of parity);

(b) commitments to assure supplies to importing countries, and to assure access to markets for exporting countries;

(c) rules on the disposal or stockpiling of surplus domestic production;

(d) limitations or prohibitions on the use of export subsidies;

(e) cooperation among participating countries to manage the supplies put into the world market;

(f) consultations between governments on the effects of national price support programs on world trade;

(g) reserves of food and fiber, under the control of national governments but subject to international review, to assure importing countries of the reliability of exporting countries to meet their supply commitments, and to provide for national and international emergencies.

AN INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR MONTOYA

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government, I have been honored to work with our chairman, Senator JOSEPH MONTOYA, in closely examining the taxpayer services provided by the IRS through hearings held both last year and this year.

Senator MONTOYA has indicated to me his deep concern with citizen service in other Federal departments and agencies whose requests for funding are reviewed by our committee.

I share his concern, and want to bring to the attention of the Senate an interview with the chairman which was printed in the Federal Times of December 25, 1974. In this interview, Senator MONTOYA addressed the problems encountered by both the Postal Service and the Civil Service Commission, and commented upon the many complaints received by Members of Congress concerning deteriorating mail service and lack of equality in Federal employment and job opportunity.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator MONTOYA's interview be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONTOYA PROMISES ACTION (By Don Mace)

WASHINGTON.—Sen. Joseph Montoya, D-N.M., has become the first member of the Senate to call for the resignation of Postmaster General E. T. Klassen.

He said that Klassen has failed to provide the "kind of leadership the U.S. Postal Service needed when it became a semiprivate corporation under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970."

Referring to a recent history of bad management decisions, high postal rates, flagging employee morale, questionable contract practices, and expensive executive recruitment, the New Mexico Democrat said that Klassen's image is "badly tarnished." Reps. Morris K. Udall, D-Ariz., Jerome R. Waldie, D-Calif., Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., and others in the House earlier asked that Klassen step down.

Montoya, chairman of the appropriations subcommittee on treasury, post office and general government, said that a career employee "who has been through the peaks and valleys of morale" should take Klassen's place.

He said that the more than $600,000 the PMG has spent on executive recruitment could have been better spent.

"I don't know why he chose to search private industry for his top people when he could easily have looked within the ranks of the USPS for this talent," he added.

Montoya promised to conduct extensive hearings on all postal operations—possibly next spring—if the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee does not.

Klassen is in deep trouble on Capitol Hill, he said.

"Things are piling up on the PMG. He has few friends in Congress."

"We are still bitter about his order of two years ago that cautioned employees not to answer congressional questions."

"Such orders do nothing to improve good congressional relations that are so necessary to improve management," he added.

While Klassen's position is worsening in Congress, his problems at home are haunting him, too, Montoya said.

"Employee morale is terrible. Service is falling off. Postal rates are rising once again. The expensive equipment he has purchased—such as the $1 billion bulk mail system—is not working. And service is as bad as the critics say," he said.

Montoya said that a test of that service he conducted in his own state proves his point.

He sent some letters from one post office to another in Santa Fe.

"It took the postal service four days to deliver the letters. They trucked them to Albuquerque to sort them. This is incredible," he said.

Montoya disclosed that he has begun to amass background information on postal operations in preparation for hearings if they become necessary.

SAYS MONTOYA—"CSC MUST DO BETTER JOB" (By Inderjit Badhwar)

WASHINGTON.—Former President Nixon "really subverted the Civil Service Commission," Sen. Joseph Montoya, chairman of the appropriations subcommittee on treasury, post office and general government, said in an interview last week.

Montoya, whose committee appropriates money for the White House including CSC, and who was a member of the Watergate committee, added that Nixon was "very brazen" in his dealings with the commission.

"He scared and cowed the commission," into doing his bidding and tolerating abuses in hiring and promotion, Montoya said.

If the White House wanted career status for one of its candidates, Montoya revealed, it would "order" the commission to accomplish this goal or deal directly with federal departments.

He said CSC "just could not protest. If the commissioners had protested they would have been asked to resign and replaced by some other puppets."

Montoya added: "It's hard for a man to say, 'I resigned for principle, the hell with my family.'"

Overall he gave good marks to the civil service commissioners calling them "persons of integrity but subject to political pressure."

CSC, he said, must do a better job in monitoring promotion policies. It must create a new inhouse organization to monitor promotions not only in Washington but in the field as well.

"There are too many religious and ethnic cliques at work" which oppose the progress of dissimilar groups, Montoya said.

"CSC must police these cliques," he emphasized.

Montoya stressed that only constant and vigilant congressional oversight could reform some of the abuses in the federal government that have been highlighted by the Watergate hearings and by subsequent revelations about widespread personnel abuses.

He readily accepted blame that Congress had not provided the kind of oversight necessary to keep the bureaucracy functioning efficiently and honestly.

And he urged different oversight committees to examine and correct abuses of authority and congressional mandates that have come to light in various federal agencies and departments.

Previous lack of congressional concern, Montoya admitted, had allowed the Office of Management and Budget to assume a role far greater than its mandate.

He said it was time to curb the growth and power of OMB and was glad to see that the House had taken the first step by chopping the agency's budget.

"We concurred with the House," Montoya said. "If we have to cut their budget just to get their attention in order to make them more accountable, we will do it."

He promised that even though his was an appropriations committee it would assume oversight responsibilities whenever necessary.

But he said his resources would limit him to taking on one target at a time.

INVESTIGATION OF CASE OF POSSIBLE RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN THE ARMY

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of the Senate to a most unfortunate incident which occurred last year and to make my colleagues aware of the facts which have been uncovered during the course of an investigation into that incident.

Col. Travis M. Gafford, a black, had been nominated for the post of Chief, Army Section, U.S. Military group, Chile. When Colonel Gafford failed to be appointed to this position, it was understood that his nomination had not been acceptable to the Government of Chile, probably as a result of his race.

I wrote the Secretary of Defense expressing my extreme distress over this matter and my desire for a thorough investigation. Mr. Schlesinger has informed me that an investigation has been conducted, and I would be pleased to share the results with my colleagues. Colonel Gafford's nomination was withheld for a number of ill-advised reasons. There was a general assumption that Chile would react unfavorably to the nomination of a black officer. In addition there was, apparently, an intention on the part of the Army to spare a black officer from a potentially antagonistic environment. The resultant situation, whatever the motives, can only be described as inexcusable, especially as it became clear during the course of the investigation that a staff recommendation favoring the nomination had been overlooked and that Colonel Gafford's own opinions and feelings on the matter were consulted only after the fact. At the same time it should be recognized that this most regrettable and unfortunate incident did not, apparently, result from overt or intentional prejudice directed against the colonel but, rather, was the product of a long series of individual misjudgments and misunderstandings inconsistent with the usually admirable performance of the Army.

I have been informed that Colonel Gafford has subsequently been appointed as Division Chief of the International Staff Affairs Office of the Strategic and Security Assistance Directorate. It is perhaps small solace to the man that his misfortune has demonstrated to the Army the great need for safeguards to prevent the recurrence of similar, potentially tragic situations.

I would like to express my gratitude to Secretary of Defense Schlesinger and to Army Secretary Callaway for their cooperation in making the facts known to all involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, memorandums from the Secretaries of Defense and the Army.

There being no objection, the memoranda were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[MEMORANDUM]

SECRETARY OF THE ARMY,

Washington, D.C., August 9, 1974.

Subject: Equal Opportunity.

The Secretary of Defense has reviewed the entire matter of the alleged unacceptability of Colonel Travis M. Gafford, a black Army officer, for a position with the U.S. Military Group, Chile. The Secretary concluded, in a letter to the Secretaries of the Military Departments (inclosed), that the failure to carry through with the Army's nomination of Colonel Gafford was inconsistent with national purpose and in conflict with the equal opportunity policies and goals of the Department. The Secretary has emphasized that assignments in the Department of Defense will be based solely on the abilities of the persons concerned and in no instance will race be a factor determining whether or not an individual is nominated for or assigned to any position.

I ask each of you to continue to be alert and work to eliminate errors which suggest any wavering in our commitment to equal opportunity. Army leadership at all levels must affirmatively and sensitively implement equal opportunity policies and programs, taking appropriate disciplinary action where warranted against those who fail in their equal opportunity responsibilities. I am 100% behind the Army's equal opportunity program—for both military and civilians. To be effective, this program will require the dedicated support of you and every leader and supervisor in the Army. I solicit your personal assistance in making this so.

HOWARD H. CALLAWAY.

MEMORANDUM

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,

Washington, D.C., August 3, 1974.

At my direction, the JCS and ISA conducted an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the alleged unacceptability of Colonel Travis M. Gafford, USA, to the Government of Chile. The Department of the Army had submitted to USSOUTHCOM the nomination of Colonel Gafford—a black officer—as Chief, Army Sections, U.S. Military Group, Chile. According to a Washington newspaper, the Chilean Government had rejected the colonel's nomination on account of his race. The JCS/ISA inquiry revealed, however, that as a result of staff action, SOUTHCOM had actually withheld the nomination and never submitted it to the Government of Chile.

Both the initial JCS/ISA inquiry and a subsequent Army investigation concluded that SOUTHCOM had not violated any policies concerning equal opportunity and that no one was at fault in the matter. However, there is additional evidence of record to indicate that SOUTHCOM did not take an adequately sensitive and thoughtful approach to the nomination.

The decision to withhold Colonel Gafford's nomination resulted from a series of individual judgments and actions, on the basis of which each participant could persuade himself that he had done nothing in contravention of departmental policy. Several of the participants simply assumed that Chile would adopt a negative reaction to the nomination. Moreover, apparently through oversight, a staff recommendation favoring the nomination never became a factor in the decision, even though it was based on a carefully researched analysis of Chilean racial attitudes. There was also an understandable but unwarranted desire to spare a black officer from a possible hostile environment—a desire based not on that officer's perspective and tolerances, but on those of the staff. As a consequence of these inadequacies the nomination did not go forward and Colonel Gafford was consulted regarding his sensitivities only after the fact.

I can only conclude that the failure to support Colonel Gafford's nomination to the U.S. Military Group, Chile, was inconsistent with national purpose and in conflict with the policies and goals of this Department. The inevitable result of collective actions, such as those taken in this case, is to constrain substantially the range of opportunities open to black officers. On the particular issue of personnel assignment, it must be emphasized once again that the Department of Defense will base assignments solely on the abilities of the persons concerned. There must be no doubt that a black member of the Armed Forces is a representative of the United States and the Department of Defense. If a nomination for any post is to be rejected because of race, it will have to be rejected from outside this Department.

The failure to nominate Colonel Gafford to a post for which he was qualified was an error that should not be tolerated. Steps have been taken to remedy the injustice to the individual, but the matter cannot rest there. Action must and will be taken by all in authority throughout the Department to assure positive and sensitive interpretation and implementation of equal opportunity directive interpretation and implementation to equal opportunity directive in the future.

More generally, I must remind you that the Secretary of Defense and the entire senior military and civilian leadership originally issued the Department of Defense Human Goals on August 18, 1969, and that each succeeding Secretary of Defense has reaffirmed and reissued them. The policy is unequivocal. Equal opportunity goals are based unmistakably on the moral imperatives of American society. This Department must share that commitment to equal opportunity, not only as a matter of theory, but as a matter of abiding practice.

JAMES R. SCHLESINGER.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,

Washington, D.C., December 17, 1974.

Hon. JOHN V. TUNNEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR TUNNEY: This will reply to your earlier inquiry into the circumstances attending the nomination of Colonel T. M. Gafford to be Chief, Army Section, Military Group, Chile. The memorandum, attached at Tab A, from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy and Air Force sets forth the circumstances as well as the Secretary's views of the incident. You will note that a complete investigation was undertaken.

In addition to circulation to the Army of the memorandum at Tab B, and individual counseling of the persons involved, the Army has moved to assure more effective oversight of and participation in personnel assignments to MAAGs and missions. These steps taken by General Abrams in 1973 included the assignment of Colonel Gafford as Division Chief of the International Staff Affairs Office of the Strategic and Security Assistance Directorate. The matter was fully discussed in detail on several occasions by Secretary Schlesinger with the Service Secretaries and Chiefs of Staff, as well as with the Armed Forces Policy Council.

If you have further questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

JOHN M. MAURY.

SENATOR HATFIELD ON WORLD FOOD

Mr. McGOVERN, Mr. President, yesterday, Senator HATFIELD, at an ad hoc Senate hearing on the world food crisis, called for an increased effort on the part of the United States in helping feed the hungry and starving of the world. He pointed out the historical precedents for such aid, including the leadership of Herbert Hoover after World War I in averting famine throughout the world.

In asking for administration leadership in the stepping up of food aid to the needy, Senator HATFIELD pointed out the necessity for the various departments of the Federal Government to put aside their disagreements and reach a consensus as to the level of assistance to be given.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of Senator HATFIELD and the New York Times article on yesterday's hearings be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR MARK O. HATFIELD

Mr. Chairman, in the aftermath of World War I, millions of people throughout Central and Eastern Europe and Russia were threatened with starvation. Already ravaged by one of the Four Horsemen, Europe was haunted by the spectre of his brothers: famine, pestilence, and death. One contemporary observer described the scene in this way: "No one who has not seen famine can have understanding of its hideous reality. Mothers at every meal watch the wilting away of their children. Gaunt mothers search for scraps of food, carry emaciated children too feeble to walk. Long streams of refugees flee from the famine areas, carrying their children and a few possessions, with many dead lying at the roadsides. Few people die directly, for disease intervenes. The hospitals and children's refuges are crowded with all who can lie on the floors. The dead lie unburied in heaps. And even worse things happen which I do not repeat here."

UMI

The eloquence is reminiscent of Senator Joseph Tydings' statement earlier this year on conditions in Calcutta, and the situation described is much the same. As we discuss the outcome of the World Food Conference and the United States response to world hunger, it is interesting and informative for us to see how America responded during and after World War I, when it was a matter of saving starving Europeans rather than Indians or Africans.

American food relief for Europe began in 1914, with the creation of the Commission for Relief of Belgium under the chairmanship of Herbert Hoover. The CRB became the neutral channel through which more than 5,100,000 tons of provisions and supplies passed through the German blockade into Belgium and were distributed by local Belgian committees. Nearly 10 million Belgian and French were included in the relief.

The CRB secured basic food stuffs by purchase or gift, transported these commodities into Belgium and guaranteed their equitable distribution under the supervision of American or neutral volunteer workers. World opinion mobilized in support of the Commission's efforts was largely responsible for the success of delicate negotiations between the belligerent and neutral nations. Relief requirements were met by gifts amounting to $162 million in cash and kind collections by volunteer committees in the United States, Britain and elsewhere; subsidies from Britain and France in the amount of $314 million; and American loans of $380 million. Altogether the CRP coordinated an effort costing nearly $900 million at an administrative expense of less than half of one percent.

This success prompted President Wilson to appoint Hoover U.S. Food Administrator in 1917. Although working with the poor harvests of 1916 and 1917 from which there was no "statistical" surplus available for export, the Food Administration and the American Relief Administration managed to stabilize prices, increase food production, maintain an adequate supply of farm labor, make great strides in food conservation and the elimination of waste, and still export nearly eight times as much food between 1917 and 1920 as in the three year period before the war.

The food was shipped all over Europe: France, Belgium, Italy, Russia, Poland and Germany. In all, 33 countries and millions of people were aided by the American Relief Administration in its public and private phases. The more remarkable efforts were made in Germany, against the stubborn opposition of some Allies and those who denounced the relief as treasonable feeding of the enemy. And so also in Russia in 1922 and 1923 when an estimated 20 million people were saved despite objections to assisting "Bolsheviks."

But the greatest of these efforts was the child feeding program. Hoover realized that "stunted bodies and deformed minds in the next generation were not the foundation on which to rebuild civilization." When the American Red Cross was unequal to the task, the American Relief Administration took it up, and determined to make the program a gift of the American people. According to Hoover, 14 to 16 million children "passed from undernourishment to health" at a cost to the United States of $325 million, the largest part of which came from charitable contributions.

In the ten years 1914-24, operations were carried on under Hoover's direction and by the organizations which he headed involving the delivery of nearly 34 million tons of commodities and the expenditure of more than $5 billion dollars. In today's dollars, the sum would be about $20 billion. And there were other voluntary aid organizations which made substantial contributions: the Red Cross, the American Friends Service Committee, the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Near East Relief, the YMCA, and others.

The operating costs for this massive relief program were nominal. The administrative cost of the entire U.S. Food Administration was only $7.3 million, less than one-half of one percent of the cost of the aid provided. Indeed, other operations of the Food Administration actually netted the U.S. Treasury $50 million.

These figures are startling in these days when the bureaucracy staggers us with 2 billion pieces of paper a year costing us $18 billion to fill out and the federal government $15 to read, and when U.S. food aid programs are continually frustrated by bureaucratic entanglements. But they are more understandable in view of the massive voluntary cooperation and contribution of the American people. Hoover knew that "although Americans can be led to make great sacrifices, they do not like to be driven." While some punitive powers were granted the Food Administration by the Congress, they were rarely used, as the self-imposed controls monitored by the so-called "War Committees" in each trade group were quite sufficient. The response was magnificent.

Twenty million Americans signed up as "members" of the Food Administration, and pledged themselves to close adherence to its production and consumption policies. Posters appeared everywhere with the motto "Save food for world relief." One effort to save fats and butter was so successful that the trades were demoralized, the Allies flooded with supplies, and the plea to save withdrawn. Charitable contributions from individuals and groups funneled through the American Relief Administration amounted to $134,000 after the Armistice, when it was no longer a question of feeding our men in uniform and the Allied soldiers during the war. As mentioned earlier, Americans or their government gave nearly one-third of a billion dollars for child feeding programs. Let me reiterate that in today's dollars the amount would be nearly 1 and 1/4 billion dollars.

In sum, the success of the European relief program during and after World War I is for the most part attributable to the willingness of the American people to voluntarily respond to the initiatives of their leaders.

There is much more to the story of American relief to Europe from 1914 to 1924, and I would be happy to provide more information for the hearing record. Ambassador Harriman will be telling us of efforts after World War II in a few minutes.

Even this brief review, Mr. Chairman, sheds an interesting light on the failure of the United States to respond adequately today to what is recognized the world over as a global food crisis. Despite high-minded rhetoric and admirable intentions, our government has sat on its bureaucratic hands while millions eke out a malnourished existence or starve. A simple request for an additional one million tons in immediate food aid has been denied; inter-agency squabbles have stymied action on "high," "middle," and "low" options for assistance; P.L. 480 shipments continue to be used as political tools rather than as humanitarian aids. This government inaction and confusion has increased public bewilderment about the world's food needs and our aid programs, and fostered cynicism about the prospects for any significant relief.

This need not be the case, Secretary Butz told us at the World Food Conference in Rome that we have available surpluses for a food aid budget of around $1.4 to $1.5 billion, enough to provide the 5.5 million tons of aid specified in the "high option" of food relief for this fiscal year. While this estimate is now disputed, I believe it could be done without initiating the reduced consumption and waste elimination programs that could provide food aid in the amounts we were able to muster after World War I. Nor does it take into account the additional gains that could be achieved if we were to vigorously encourage all-out production.

For a variety of reasons of which we are painfully aware, these actions have not been taken. I suggest that our failure to act is simply a lack of political will and courage. I do not believe that it is because the American people would not support an immediate and intensive relief effort. My office is flooded with mail from constituents voicing their concern and pledging their support of private and public programs to feed the world's hungry people. They reflect the compassion of the American people. Despite ever-rising food prices here at home and the restrictions of recession, they are willing to make personal sacrifices so others might eat.

This willingness of the American people to help others in need is evidenced in an informal survey taken by my office of private, voluntary relief agencies. A representative of CARE stated "if the economy is having an effect on giving, it is a good effect. Our current receipts amount to about $6 million as of November 22, and represent only cash gifts, not those in kind." The Mennonite Central Committee reports that their receipts are up 15% to 20% over last year, and expect their level will be maintained. They receive correspondence from all across the U.S. and Canada indicating the desire of their constituency to be of help and urging the government to do more. Representatives of Catholic Relief Services report they expected a decrease in giving because of the economic situation, but instead have experienced an increase in individual gifts. One comment from this organization was particularly illuminating: "The American people are expressing greater compassion for the needy than is our government."

These reports are most reassuring. Despite years of wheat deals, foreign aid failures, and a politicized food aid program, the American people are not yet content to withdraw into their citadel of affluence while people starve overseas. We in government sell them short when we view them as grim misers unwilling to make a few sacrifices for the benefit of others. I expect we take this view to rationalize our own impotence. The people of this country have never refused to help others when their leaders provided direction and the aim was clear. It is no wonder that they grow impatient and cynical when their representatives debate technicalities incomprehensible to those who are starving.

President Ford has the authority to take a humanitarian initiative of dimensions similar to that of Presidents Wilson and Truman to prevent the starvation of millions in the countries most seriously hit by the food and energy shortages and price increases of the past year. If he would do so, he could give meaning to the resolutions of the World Food Conference and a sense of leadership to the American people. I urge him to take that initiative.

And, Mr. Chairman, I propose that he do more. I propose that he take the lead of Presidents Wilson and Truman and appoint, with the consent of the Senate, a Food Administrator to coordinate, promote and expand all U.S. food aid programs to countries in need. Like Mr. Hoover, he should be directly responsible to the President, and should receive the full cooperation of the Departments of Agriculture, State, and Treasury, in devising and implementing food aid programs. His office should be the clearinghouse for all information on food availability and need. He should be employed to implement national programs to curb consumption and eliminate waste, with an emphasis on voluntary action. Food and fertilizer production should be increased posthaste and these programs of the Department of Agriculture and other agencies closely supervised through his office. So also with the shipment of foodstuffs and other commodities to foreign nations. Prices should be stabilized to guarantee the farmer a fair return for his product while preventing black market and profiteering.

Furthermore, the Food Administrator should also be directed to work closely with voluntary aid agencies, facilitating their efforts through his office and coordinating them with government programs. The continued public support of these agencies indicate a confidence in their efforts that must be retained. They have often been more successful than government agencies in providing assistance. Such success should be fostered. Finally, he should make regular reports to the American people on the progress of programs and the success of their efforts. I expect that much of this can be accomplished under existing authority providing the leadership is forthcoming. Other elements of this proposal may well require Congressional action, and certainly the necessary funding.

Senator Humphrey has already drafted a Senate Resolution calling upon the President to appoint a food coordinator to work with existing agencies in ways similar to those I have described, and I am pleased to join him in sponsoring that Resolution.

I do so, and make my own proposal, in the firm expectation that we can bring relief to a hungry world if we will only rally ourselves and our people and make a determined effort. As Mr. Hoover said after World War II, "if every source of supplies will do its utmost, we can pull the world through this most dangerous crisis. The saving of these human lives is far more than an economic necessity for the recovery of the world. Such action marks the return of the lamp of compassion to the world. And that is part of the moral and spiritual reconstruction of the world."

HATFIELD BIDS UNITED STATES NAME A FOOD-AID ADMINISTRATOR

(By William Robbins)

WASHINGTON, December 18.—Senator Mark O. Hatfield, assailing what he called a lack of leadership in the Administration, called today for an effort on the scale of that led by Herbert Hoover during and after World War I to feed the hungry and starving in nations threatened by famine. The Senator, backed by two other liberal Republicans as well as Democrats at an ad hoc Senate hearing on the world food situation, called for appointment of food administrator with responsibilities comparable to the wartime role that the Hoover played to lead governmental and private efforts and motivate people to make necessary sacrifices.

"I suggest that our failure to act is simply a lack of political will and courage," said Senator Hatfield, who is from Oregon. He added that his mail, reflecting widespread compassion, showed that the American people were ahead of their leaders.

A FORD REJECTION CITED

Among other witnesses at the hearing, headed by Senator George S. McGovern, Democrat of South Dakota, was Edwin M. Martin, who was deputy chairman of the United States delegation to the United Nations World Food Conference in Rome this fall.

Mr. Martin, who retired last week as an assistant to Secretary of State Kissinger, disclosed that at the Rome conference, he supported a call from several Senators for an increased food-aid commitment by the United States. The request, he said, was rejected by President Ford. Mr. Martin said he had thought that "it would be helpful to the United States position in the world if we could announce a minimum commitment," and added:

"I did think it would be useful for the United States to get the credit for what I was sure it would do in the end."

But, noting that the United States was already providing more such aid than any other country, Mr. Martin said he thought it was "unfair to ask the United States to take a second step before others take their first."

HATFIELD IS APPLAUDED

After Senator Hatfield read his statement, the Senate hearing was interrupted by extended applause from an audience of about 300.

Mr. Hatfield recalled that large contributions had helped the American relief effort during and after World War I, and that "20 million Americans signed up" to help produce and conserve food. He went on:

"The success of the European relief program is for the most part attributable to the willingness of the American people to voluntarily respond to the initiatives of their leaders—when their leaders are willing to lead."

RHETORIC AND INACTION

"Despite high-minded rhetoric and admirable intentions, our Government has sat on its bureaucratic hands while millions eke out a malnourished existence or starve. Interagency squabbles have stymied action on high, middle and low options for assistance."

He was referring to disagreements, primarily between the State Department and the Office of Management and Budget, over proposed levels of food aid for this fiscal year, ranging from $1-billion to more than $1.4-billion, with the State Department supporting the high figure.

President Ford was asked by the agencies early last week to give them a decision. Food program officials say that continued delay would make it difficult to reach even a middle option—about $1.2-billion—before the fiscal year ends next June 30.

In response to a question, the White House issued a statement tonight saying: "The President has the matter under consideration. He is aware of the importance of the problem and we expect a decision shortly."

White House aides said that they hoped for a decision before President Ford leaves for Vail, Colo., this weekend.

At the Senate hearing Mr. Hatfield said that his office has been "flooded with mail from constituents voicing their concern and pledging their support of private and public programs to feed the world's hungry people."

IN CHILDREN'S EYES

He quoted from several letters by school children who had seen pictures of starving children. From Yonah, Ore.:

"The little boy was eating a piece of bean and they should have more in their mouth don't you think I do. They are starving to death. If we was them they would send food to us. Why don't you do something?"

Senator Hatfield said an informal survey by his office showed increasing individual contributions to private food relief agencies.

President Ford, he said, "has the authority to take a humanitarian initiative of dimensions similar to those taken by Presidents Wilson and Truman. If he would do so, he could give meaning to the resolutions of the World Food Conference and a sense of leadership to the American people. I urge him to take that initiative."

CUTTING TAXES—FIRST PRIORITY FOR THE 94TH CONGRESS

Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. President, the current economic policies of the Ford administration, to deal with the worst economic situation since the depression, are characterized by one word—"confusion."

Only in the last few days has there been any indication by the administration that it realizes that we face a "two-headed monster" of inflation and recession; that we have two public enemies, rather than one.

While this is progress, it has taken much too long to face the hard economic facts of life. As disturbing, the administration is still unaware of the real magnitude of the recession and, therefore, is giving little attention to the strong medicine needed at this time to cure our economic ills and get our economy on its feet again.

But, while the administration may not yet understand how serious a recession we are in, I assure you that the American consumer and working family are feeling it directly and suffer under none of the same illusions.

Do not mistake me: Inflation is still a serious problem and will remain one at least through 1975. Yet, the more threatening danger, Mr. President, and the focus of our economic weapons, must be on recession.

Today 6 million American men and women are out of work, and the OECD says the number of the unemployed will climb to almost 8 million next year. We have not had so many people out of work since 1941. Industrial production is almost 5 percent below the 1973 level, and falling. Housing construction is at an 8-year low with unemployment in construction nearly 15 percent. In just over 1 year, the after-tax real income of a family of four has fallen 6 percent.

We know from sad experience that recession has a life of its own. The shutdown of auto plants pushes copper, rubber, glass, plastic, and steelworkers out on the street to join unemployed auto-workers. They stop buying Christmas gifts and clothing—which causes layoffs in retailing and manufacturing. And so it goes, down the hill, gathering momentum, like a giant snowball.

We have been through all of this before and we know how to avoid it. We know how to get the snowball to slow down and finally, to melt away. And we know, all too well, how dangerous it is to stand by and wring our hands in indecision while its destructive momentum accelerates.

The momentum of recession can be halted by forceful and direct action to stimulate the economy through a substantial tax cut. We know that is what should be done. We know that is how unemployment is reduced and income increased. And, we know that this can be done without harming the fight against inflation, because there are many, many sectors now working well below full capacity and thus fanning the flames of inflation. Added demand in those sectors won't start a new round of price increases—but it will reduce unemployment, raise incomes and increase output.

December 19, 1974

As far back as last June, I led the fight on the Senate floor for tax relief to head off this recession—a fight to provide tax relief for the low- and middle-income families hurt most by soaring prices, falling incomes and mounting unemployment.

This fight was reflected in the "Interim Report on Inflation" of the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, which recommended in September that tax relief was a necessary and urgent step that we should take.

Again, on September 28, in my summation before the Economic Summit Conference, I repeated the call for tax relief. I urged that recession and inflation be viewed as dual problems, and that we should not attack inflation alone, but fight just as vigorously against recession. As I said then, "inflation erodes income, but recession destroys it."

Two weeks ago, I urged that a $10 billion tax cut, aimed primarily at low- and middle-income working families, be the No. 1 priority of the 94th Congress when it convenes in January.

This past Monday, December 16, I outlined the details of this tax cut proposal to the Senate and stated my firm intention to introduce this legislation at the outset of the 94th Congress.

This Sunday, the Joint Economic Committee will issue its extensive study of inflation. A principal recommendation in that report will be an immediate $10 billion reduction in taxes.

In recent days, I have been joined in my call for a major tax cut, by many of our Nation's leading economists and several of our most distinguished business leaders.

Today, in testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Dr. Charles Schultz, now an associate of the Brookings Institution, urged Congress to enact a major tax cut. As a former Director of the Bureau of the Budget, he is perhaps uniquely qualified to judge the desirability of a stimulative tax cut at this time. Dr. Schultz recognizes, as I do, that a tax cut is vital, if we are to reverse the recessionary momentum and prevent an unnecessary economic tragedy in America.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to join me in sponsoring a $10 billion tax cut as the first order of business in the new Congress. I also commend the testimony of Dr. Schultz today, before the Senate Budget Committee, to the careful scrutiny of all my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Schultz's testimony, "The Economy and Fiscal Policy," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ECONOMY AND FISCAL POLICY

(Testimony of Charles L. Schultz, the Brookings Institution, before the Senate Committee on the Budget, December 19, 1974)

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, your Committee has already heard from a distinguished panel of economists about the economic outlook and the kinds of corrective fiscal policy measures which that outlook calls for. In the absence of strong policy measures they foresee a continued decline in economic activity at least for the next six months, an unemployment rate reaching and perhaps exceeding 8 percent by midsummer 1975, and a real danger of even further deterioration. That picture is widely shared among independent economic forecasters and presents, I believe, a sober and realistic view of the near term economic future. Rather than simply add another voice to this consensus I would like to take that outlook as given and proceed to examine briefly its implications in three areas of interest to the committee:

First, what are the very special features of this recession which must be taken into account in designing fiscal policies to turn it around;

Second, what do current economic problems suggest about how your Committee addresses its first full year of work; and

Third, how does the energy problem relate to our economic difficulties, and how should energy policy be tied in with overall budgetary measures?

I. THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF THIS RECESSION, AND THEIR MEANING FOR BUDGETARY POLICY

The current recession is not a typical economic cycle, in which business spending on plant and equipment and inventories or consumer purchases of durable goods temporarily over-reach themselves, fall off, and with the aid of easy money and stimulative fiscal measures, snap back to more normal levels. There are several more pervasive influences at work that tend to make this recession deeper and more stubborn than has been typical of other postwar downturns.

The first of these features has to do with oil. My colleague George Perry has compared the sudden increase in the price of crude oil that occurred this year to a giant excise tax levied on the American consumer, siphoning off purchasing power and leading to a drop in real incomes. The additional money directly and indirectly paid by consumers for petroleum products goes principally to the OPEC countries and into the profits of domestic oil companies.

Ultimately a large part of this diverted flow of funds will be resented—on American exports to the producing countries and on increased investment in domestic energy sources. But in 1974 and 1975 most of the "oil excise tax" will not be resented—it is being drawn off from the income stream and effectively sterilized. Exports to OPEC are rising, but by a far smaller amount than their increased revenues. Oil and gas industry investments have expanded, but have been offset by a drop in electric utility investment. On balance, only a small part of the "oil excise tax" has been resented on buying goods and services.

Starting with Perry's estimates for the size of the drain, I have conservatively calculated that in 1975 it should amount to a $25 to $30 million reduction in consumer purchasing power. One does not need to invoke complex psychological theories of consumer confidence to explain why markets are weak and sales are falling—about $25 to $30 million is being removed from the spending stream and not replaced.

The behavior of the federal budget has been exacerbating the problem. In the third quarter of 1974 total output in the American economy was 3 percent below late 1973 and still falling, while unemployment was racing past the 6 percent level. Despite the recession, however, the federal budget (on a national income accounts basis) was virtually in balance during the third quarter. While output was below a year ago, federal revenues, pushed upward by inflation, were 16 percent higher. In practice, even if not through intent, we are reverting to the outdated practice of trying to balance the budget in the face of a rapidly falling economy.

What has brought us to this fix? Partly the problem stems from the fact that in our progressive tax system rapid inflation acts just like an increase in tax rates. Even though for most people money incomes in the past year have not kept pace with inflation, they have increased. People have been pushed into higher tax brackets, despite the fact that their real income is down. Effective rates of taxation have risen. The consequence of having both rapid inflation and recession at the same time is that the federal budget automatically behaves perversely—it gives us tax rate increases at precisely the time we should be having tax cuts to fight the recession. At the same time the real purchasing power of those parts of the federal budget which are determined by fixed dollar appropriations is being reduced, also producing a depressing effect on economic activity.

How large are these budgetary effects? We cannot measure them by looking at the actual budget balance—the rapid decline in output and unemployment is acting to reduce revenues while inflation is acting to increase them. One imperfect but serviceable way to look at the problem is to ask the following question: Suppose this recession had not happened; suppose the rate of unemployment and the level of capacity utilization were the same now as they were in early 1973. What would the federal budget look like? Under those conditions, given the rate of inflation we have experienced, the federal budget would have shifted from a $7 billion deficit in the second quarter of 1973 to a $27 billion surplus last quarter—a swing of $34 billion in less than a year and a half.

In addition to the more usual cyclical influences, therefore, the demand for goods and services has been sharply depressed over the past year by the combination of the oil excise tax and the perverse behavior of the federal budget during a period which combines inflation with recession.

We cannot leave the matter there, however. While the oil price increases are now siphoning off and "sterilizing" a large slice of consumer purchasing power, these funds will gradually re-enter the income stream in later years, in the form of demands for American exports and increased investment in domestic energy industries. The demand depressing effects of the oil excise tax, in other words, have a time profile—large at first, and then diminishing. Similarly the effect of inflation on the federal budget acts initially to depress demand as revenues react more quickly than expenditures, but this effect is likely to be moderated after a time, as appropriations for various programs are eventually raised simply to take account of the higher prices.

Given the economic outlook presented to you by earlier panelists, and the analysis outlined above, what are the implications for the design of fiscal policy in 1975?

First, the economy needs a large dose of fiscal stimulation. By the third quarter of this year, GNP was already 4½ percent or 70 billion below the level which would provide employment for 95 percent of the work force. By the middle of 1975 GNP is likely to be 140 billion below the level consistent with a 5 percent unemployment target, and even further below the traditional 4 percent unemployment target. As I have indicated the current market depressing forces of the oil excise tax and the federal budget are huge—approaching $30 billion each. The economy has already slipped so far that even with vigorous action it will be a long time before recovery can produce reasonably prosperity. For example, even if a combination of fiscal measures, monetary policy, and good luck turned the economy around by mid-year, and produced a steady growth of 7 percent a year in real output, it would not be until the fourth quarter of 1978—four years from now—that the unemployment rate would fall to 5 percent.

In the face of these facts small measures will not do. We have an economy of $1.4 trillion dollars, beset by very large depressing forces. Applying minuscule fiscal policy measures, which add to $5 to $10 billion, cannot provide the leverage needed to achieve a reasonable recovery path. How large should the stimulus be? Professor Eckstein suggested a $25 billion fiscal package to the Committee. In 1964, with an unemployment rate of only 5.2 percent (compared to the current 6½ to 7 percent) an $11 billion tax cut was enacted to promote economic recovery, and was remarkably successful at doing so. In terms of today's much larger GNP a fiscal stimulus of the same relative size would amount to $25 billion. I think much more work needs to be done to estimate the magnitude of the appropriate fiscal action, but it is already clear that it will have to be a large one.

The second implication for fiscal policy, arising from the analysis of the current situation, is that some part (though not all) of the depressing forces now acting on the economy will gradually taper off over the next several years. As I pointed out, a sizeable portion of the income drain from higher oil prices will eventually filter back into the spending stream. And the general inflation, which quickly and more than proportionately increased federal revenues, will ultimately be reflected in higher federal outlays. When the depressing effects of these events are at their peak, as they are now, the countervailing fiscal stimulus ought to be large. But the need for fiscal stimulus will diminish over the next three or four years, as the offsetting factors begin to operate. This suggests that some part of the sizeable fiscal stimulus, urgently needed now, be of a temporary nature, and decline in succeeding years. Otherwise we may commit ourselves to a pattern of revenues and expenditures which, however appropriate now, may not fit the needs of 1977 and 1978.

In short, the specific budgetary actions called for by the urgent needs of the present must be designed and evaluated in terms not just of today but of tomorrow as well. And this brings me to my second major topic.

II. FISCAL POLICY MEASURES AND THE ROLE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

Given the way economic events are unfolding, next year will, I am convinced, see the enactment of large scale budgetary measures aimed at stemming the recession and promoting recovery. There are a number of major choices to be made:

How large should the budgetary stimulus be?

How much of the stimulus should be in the form of expenditure increases and how much in the form of tax cuts?

What kinds of expenditure programs should be increased, judged both by criteria of speed and effectiveness in putting people back to work and by criteria of social need?

What kinds of tax cuts should be enacted; what part should be temporary and what part permanent?

What will be the effect of various actions next year on the budget and the economy in 1976, 1977, and 1978, and how should these projections influence the choices to be made in 1975?

Unless the budget is viewed as a whole, and in the context not only of 1975 but of later years, Congress will never have a chance to make these choices explicitly. Rather a piecemeal series of actions will be taken, on expenditures and taxes, adding up willy-nilly at the end of the session to an overall picture that no one had in mind when voting for or against each particular action. Reasonable people can and should differ over what is the appropriate combination of fiscal measures. But they cannot even carry on an intelligent debate until they have a set of options presented to them.

The situation is, indeed, made to order for this Committee. You can undertake to design several alternative sets of possibilities, that differ from each other in terms of magnitude, expenditure increase, tax cuts, and temporary vs. permanent effects. You can, at least roughly, trace the consequences of each set on the economy and on the budget. You can outline how choices will affect subsequent years. In doing so you need not come crosswise with other Committees by getting deeply into the detailed design of particular tax or expenditure measures. But by laying out several alternative budget policies in a comprehensive way, and discussing the major strengths and drawbacks of each, in a framework not just of 1975 but of later years, you can, I think, perform an immensely valuable and urgently needed service to the Congress and the country.

For what it is worth, my own choice among the various possible options, at least in very general terms, would run along the following lines:

There are areas in which federal expenditure programs can be used speedily and effectively to spur recovery; but these are limited in number and magnitude, given the size of the needed fiscal stimulus.

A large part of the necessary stimulus must come from a tax cut;

Part of that tax cut should be temporary in nature; or as an alternative, the continuation of part of the tax cut beyond a certain date should be made statutorily contingent on the subsequent enactment of an equivalent amount in revenue-raising reforms;

The benefits of the tax cut should be concentrated principally among the poor and the average worker, as a means of offsetting some of the recent loss in real wages, and restoring purchasing power; to the extent possible the tax cut should be used as an inducement to secure wage restraint during the present period of inflation cum recession; devoting part of the fiscal stimulus to a reduction in payroll taxes would be a highly desirable way of achieving some of these objectives.

But as far as the work of this Committee is concerned, picking out one particular set of choices may not be most immediate task. Rather it lies in beginning to develop, and to analyze, a number of comprehensive fiscal alternatives.

III. THE ROLE OF ENERGY POLICY

It is very important, I think, to be quite clear on just how energy policy relates to overall economic and budgetary policy. Although one major reason for our current economic difficulties is the reduced purchasing power occasioned by the rise in oil prices, economic recovery can not—I repeat not—be brought about by changes in energy policy.

To offset the loss of purchasing power and real consumer spending resulting from higher oil prices we must act through such standard fiscal measures as reductions in taxes or increases in federal expenditures. No matter what we do by way of oil conservation, prices will not return to 1973 levels, nor are they likely to drop very far in the immediate future. There is rationale for undertaking rigorous conservation measures—but economic recovery does not hinge upon such actions, nor would such actions themselves promote recovery.

In the long run we would like to see lower oil prices. Ultimately we must pay for high-price imports through a transfer of real goods and services to the oil exporters. Insofar as we develop high-price domestic fuels we divert scarce resources from other uses. As a consequence, even with full employment and economic prosperity restored, higher oil prices imply some reduction in our living standards below what they otherwise would have been. If world oil prices remain at present levels, domestic prices will eventually match them. The effect will be to lower living standards by perhaps 2 percent below trend. This reduction equals about one year's normal growth in real per capita income. Insofar as the U.S. is concerned, therefore, we can say two things about oil prices:

(1) The immediate siphoning of funds from the spending stream by higher oil prices depresses demand throughout the economy; this can and should be offset by fiscal measures which increase market demand.

(2) Even with demand and employment restored to prosperity levels, the higher price of energy leads to a reduction in living standards; but this is a moderate, and certainly not a catastrophic drop.

No one knows whether and how world oil prices can be brought down. But we do know that the greater the reduction in the size of the world oil market, the more difficult it will be for the OPEC countries to keep prices at today's levels. A shrinking market means that prices can be maintained only by reductions in output among OPEC countries. And we do know that those OPEC countries with large populations and ambitious development programs are most reluctant to cut back output. Hence, output reduction may have to fall disproportionately on some members of the cartel, thereby threatening its cohesion and effectiveness. Reducing the size of the world oil market, therefore, will not guarantee a price reduction but it will substantially increase the chances of it happening.

Over the next few years the possibility of reducing U.S. imports through the expansion of domestic energy sources is quite limited. Major cutbacks in imports will have to come from reduced consumption. Effective conservation measures by the major consuming countries afford the only realistic means of reducing the size of the oil market in the years ahead.

This then, is the role of oil conservation policy—to increase the long run chances of a reduction in world oil prices, not as a device to restore employment and spending, but as a means of reducing the impact of higher oil prices in a fully employed economy. It is an important objective. But it ought not to be confused with the measures needed immediately to cope with the recession.

One final observation about the relationship of oil conservation to budgetary policy. A large increase in the gasoline tax is a prominent candidate among the measures available to reduce oil consumption (although the President has done his best to knock it in the head every time it emerges). Without going into the merits of taxes versus rationing, I would like to stress two points. First, if a gasoline tax is enacted, it is vital that it be fully refunded through an income tax rebate or other measures. A 20 cent gasoline tax would raise almost $20 billion. The last thing this economy needs is a further $20 billion drain in purchasing power. Full rebate of any gasoline tax is critical. Second, a gasoline tax rebate would not provide any net economic stimulus; it would merely offset the restrictive effect of the gasoline tax itself. Hence, the total size of the required tax cut, taking into account both the gasoline tax rebate and the additional fiscal stimulus, would have to be very large indeed. If, after further careful examination, the net budgetary stimulus that is needed should indeed turn out to be in the neighborhood of $20 to $25 billion; if most of that stimulus comes in the form of a tax reduction; and if a 20 cent gasoline tax is fully rebated; then the total size of the necessary tax cut would range between $35 and $40 billion.

ADDRESS BY ROBERT R. COKER ON THE HISTORY OF SOUTH CAROLINA AGRICULTURE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently Dr. Robert R. Coker, president of Coker's Pedigreed Seed Co. of Hartsville,

S.C., spoke to the Southern Regional Planning Committee on the history of South Carolina agriculture. Dr. Coker is widely known for his agronomic work as a plant breeder. He has given outstanding leadership to many agricultural groups throughout his distinguished career and has been honored numerous times for his agricultural contributions.

Dr. Coker recently addressed the Southern Regional Planning Committee. This is a joint planning effort among the State agricultural experiment stations of our land grant universities, the colleges of 1890, the schools of forestry, extension service, and various agencies in the U.S. Department of Agriculture involved in agricultural and forestry research.

In his presentation, Dr. Coker pointed out that the chronicle of agricultural development in South Carolina was representative of the agricultural history of most Southern States. He then proceeded to trace that fascinating history from the early days of rice and indigo, through the days of the War Between the States when cotton was king, to the ascendancy of the principal modern-day agricultural crops in South Carolina—soybeans and tobacco.

Dr. Coker emphasized the role of agricultural societies and the research and extension efforts of land grant colleges in making farming a highly scientific enterprise. He noted that "brain power and intellectual life are working intensely on the land now, applying the laws of nature and economics" to all phases of agricultural production and marketing.

Mr. President, I think Dr. Coker's address is particularly appropriate with our Nation's Bicentennial approaching. This is an excellent time to look back on where we have been in agriculture, evaluate our present state of affairs, and chart our course for the future. Dr. Coker's remarks are helpful toward that end, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH CAROLINA AGRICULTURE—PAST AND PRESENT (Remarks by Robert R. Coker)

I count it a privilege to talk about the history of South Carolina agriculture before so distinguished a group as the Southern Regional Planning Committee who have honored us by holding their meeting in the Carolina low country at Hobcaw Barony where landmarks of agricultural history are woven into contemporary research in agricultural science.

In his initial communication with me, Dr. Halpin suggested that I speak on the general subject of agricultural history in the South. Since this appeared much too broad a subject to treat in limited time and space, even if I felt adequate to the task, I sought and received his permission to limit my remarks to a brief survey of the history of agriculture in South Carolina. In a sense, this will serve the purpose of his initial request since, in broad terms at least, the history of agriculture in South Carolina or in almost any Southern state is, with some exceptions, the history of Southern agriculture in microcosm.

The advanced stage of agriculture today makes it difficult to imagine the beginnings when first attempts were made to convert wilderness lands into productive field and pasture. The records tell us that the first settlers brought with them cotton seed, ginger roots, canes, several sorts of vines, and olives. Forests covering the land were so dense that it took six men six weeks to clear six acres. Stimulated by a warm moist atmosphere and fed by a rich soil, vegetation grew luxuriantly and continually threatened to take back into the forest the small acreage cleared for cultivation.

About 1689 rice made its appearance when a New England slave ship put into the Charleson harbor and Dr. Henry Woodward obtained from its captain about a peck of Madagascar rice. Within 20 years, rice industry had developed in South Carolina with sailing vessels from many parts of the world putting into the Charleston and Georgetown harbors to take on rice cargoes for delivery in principal parts of the world. Prosperity resulting from the cultivation of rice produced a wealthy planter aristocracy with which the romantic South is still identified. Hobcaw Barony, where your meeting is being held, is in the midst of an area where rice culture spawned a wealth and a civilization still identified by the splendid homes and spacious grounds of antebellum mansions built along the rivers that flow into Winyah Bay at Georgetown.

The rice industry flourished in South Carolina for more than 150 years. Being mainly hoe cultivated and hand harvested, it lent itself naturally to slave labor. But with the freeing of the slaves and the development of rice fields in the Southwest where the crop could be handled principally by machinery, the rice industry in South Carolina began to fade out of the picture and by the early part of the present century it belonged to history.

About the time that rice was introduced into the state, indigo put in its appearance. The plant came from the West Indies and was first successfully grown and processed by Eliza Lucas, who became Mrs. Charles Pinckney. Indigo and rice culture prospered together for almost a hundred years. The production of indigo was encouraged by English demand for it and an English bounty paid on each pound shipped from American to British ports. But when the American colonies declared their independence from Great Britain, the bounty ceased and with its termination the value of indigo as a commercial crop ceased.

Cotton was planted in South Carolina during the first year of the colonial settlement but its importance as a commercial crop was not realized until Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin. The effect of Whitney's invention on cotton production is shown by the fact that South Carolina's million and a half pounds of cotton produced in 1791 had increased to 20 million pounds in 1801, or an increase of almost 2000 per cent in a 10-year period. The cotton gin also had the effect of firmly attaching the ante-bellum South to a slave economy.

Cotton production increased steadily until 1860 when 350,000 bales were produced, valued at about $14 million. The Confederate War and Reconstruction resulted in a sharp decline in production, but by 1880 it had come back strongly with a production of 450,000 bales. By 1911 it had reached a record of over a million and six hundred thousand bales. Then came the boll weevil, combined with the high cost of production and low market value to put cotton on the decline again.

The culture of long staple Sea Island cotton had spread rapidly up and down the coast and brought a golden age to agriculture in the Sea Island country. Large fortunes were made among Sea Island growers. But just past the turn of the century when the boll weevil put in its appearance, the fabled story of Sea Island cotton came to an end because its paper thin bolls and late maturity date made it ideal for destruction by the weevil.

Tobacco culture was of only minor importance in South Carolina until late in the 19th century when the first commercial crop of flue-cured tobacco was grown in the Pee Dee. By the mid-90's it was on the road to becoming a major crop destined to replace cotton as the foremost crop in South Carolina.

The decline in production forced on cotton by the boll weevil not only stimulated the production of tobacco, it also introduced an era of wide diversification on South Carolina farms including truck produce, grass-land farming to support a livestock and dairy industry, poultry production, tree farming, and in the early 1950's an emphasis upon soybean production which by the late 60's and early 70's had become so extensive as to vie with tobacco as the leading South Carolina crop. Soybean's ascendancy is one of the more remarkable developments in recent years.

From 1935-44 the average acreage planted in South Carolina was 74,000 acres of which only 10,000 was harvested for beans, the rest being for forage. In 1935 the average per acre yield was 6.9 bushels, but by 1971 the acreage planted for beans was 1,070,000 acres and the average yield had increased to 21.5 bushels per acre.

Why this spectacular rise in soybean production? Numerous reasons may be given. Soybeans are easier to grow than some crops. Because they produce their own nitrogen nodules, they require less fertilizer and are therefore produced at lower cost. They are also highly adapted to mechanization throughout the entire growth and harvesting process. Extensive work in varietal development in the 1940's and 50's had resulted in the development of high-producing, shatter-resistant varieties, and a world wide demand for additional protein had produced a ready and profitable soybean market. This combination of circumstances, beginning in the middle 50's and extending through the 60's into these years of the 70's, spiraled soybean production upward into a position in which it now challenges tobacco as the state's principal crop.

Through its long agricultural history, South Carolina has seen one money crop replaced and another grow to temporary ascendancy. The downfall of indigo supported the uplift of rice, then both of these were lost to cotton. During the teen years and the early 20's when the boll weevil was marching across the state's cotton fields, cotton began to lose its top rank as a money crop as tobacco came to prominence in the Pee Dee and pushed cotton from its longtime throne. Now today, soybean acreage is spread so extensively across the state that tobacco is no longer the unchallenged leader of South Carolina crops. Of singular significance is the diversification which now characterizes South Carolina agriculture in contrast to earlier years when emphasis centered chiefly in one primary cash crop.

The factors involved in this progression of change were many and varied. In the case of rice, the labor was lost; in the case of indigo the market was lost; in the case of cotton it became a struggle between man and an insect. It was the first time that South Carolina farmers had been faced with the threatened loss of their primary income from insect damage.

But long before this happened, farsighted leaders had come to understand the relationship between science and cultivation of the soil. Indeed, the dawn of the 18th century saw the beginning of a new era for agriculture in most parts of the world. Agriculture was still called an "art," but it was fast taking on the earmarks of a science. Back in England, the farmers had copied lessons from the industrious and progressive Dutch, and were growing turnips and tulips for the first time. Stock-raising was no longer regarded as an alternate to crop-growing, but an important part of any farming enterprise.

In Carolina experimentation became the keynote of the planters' activities. They seized onto new crops with eagerness, and once the seed was procured, lost no time in making tests. With dogged determination they went ahead with their experiments in spite of disheartening obstacles. These early South Carolinians had no government technicians to consult, no scientific treatises to aid them, and few labor-saving devices. Each plantation was a kind of laboratory, and each planter a pioneer in agricultural science.

Among the early ones in South Carolina away from the rice-growing coastal country was David Rogerson Williams of Darlington County, three times a member of the U.S. Congress, a brigadier general in the War of 1812, and a one-term governor of South Carolina beginning in 1814. He was a pioneer industrialist who built and operated one of the first cotton manufacturing plants in the South, and a multiple plantation owner who introduced the mule to Southern agriculture and pioneered in scientific agricultural methods, including land reclamation, irrigation, and use of river silt for soil enrichment on his plantations along the Great Pee Dee River in Darlington County. Governor Williams, little remembered in South Carolina today, was one of the state's most remarkable men and an authentic prophet of the role destined to be played by science in the future history of American agriculture.

Like the colonists of earlier years, post-Revolutionary planters, like Williams, were experimentalists eager to obtain new knowledge and share it with other planters. It was from this desire to spread knowledge of agricultural advances and discoveries that agricultural societies were formed. The first of these was the Agricultural Society of South Carolina organized August 24, 1785, with Thomas Heyward, Jr. as first president. In an address to the Society three days after its organization, he opened his remarks with the following declaration:

"After having gloriously succeeded by assistance of Divine Providence and our own exertions in terminating a war which has laid waste our country, it is incumbent upon us equally to promote and enjoy the blessings of peace. These blessings of peace cannot be effected by any means more interesting and advantageous than by turning our attention to the cultivation and improvement of our fields. We ought not only to think of restoring their former appearance, which has been defaced by the horrors of war; but as by the events of that war, the fruits of the labor we shall now bestow upon them are now secured to our own, and not at a master's disposal, we are encouraged and should be induced to make further exertions for rendering both their beauty and their produce greater."

This and other societies like it, among them the Pendleton Farmer's Society founded in the early 1800's, and the Darlington Agricultural Society founded in 1846, pointed toward founding of the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Land Grant Colleges in 1862. Subsequent passage of legislation establishing State Experiment Stations and State Extension Services within the Land Grant college system provided that a fair share of the operating funds be supplied by the Federal Government on a matching arrangement with the states.

Thus, what had been individual planters experimenting on their own and agricultural societies sharing the knowledge and experience thus obtained now became an organized system for marshalling the resources of government in cooperation with colleges and universities to bring the full benefits of science to American agriculture.

Thomas G. Clemson died in 1888, leaving the bulk of his estate to the State of South Carolina for founding, on certain conditions, an agricultural and mechanical college. Born in Philadelphia in 1807, he received a Paris education in chemistry, metallurgy and mining. He also became a friend of John C. Calhoun and married his daughter. For some years as a South Carolina planter, he put his ideas in practice, drawing upon his observations of European interest in agricultural and technical education while serving as U.S. charge d'affaires to Belgium. South Carolina accepted his gift and in 1893 opened the doors of what is now Clemson University to 446 students. It was the beginning of a new day for agriculture in South Carolina.

Postdating Clemson's opening by only nine years was the pioneering work of David R. Coker who in 1902 initiated the first successful commercial cotton improvement program in the United States based on scientific principles. Son of Major James Lide Coker, a Confederate war veteran, he inherited his father's love for growing things and a philanthropist's desire to translate that love into a better life for his native South. He initiated his work not as a business enterprise but as a pure service to Southern farmers. It was not until 16 years after his initial work began and long after the value of scientific plant breeding had been demonstrated that he agreed to the establishment of Coker's Pedigreed Seed Company, a commercial corporation independent of the general merchandise store under whose wings it had functioned and been financed.

I will not go into the historic particulars of this now 72 year old plant breeding organization founded by my father, and of which I now have the honor of being president. It is enough to say that its work has been and continues to be an integral part of the revolution in Southern agriculture which has characterized the 20th century. By the work of ourselves and others in the private sector, in which we are joined in many common efforts with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Land Grant colleges, and their Experiment Stations and Extension Services, old, slow, expensive methods have been replaced by others which are new, rapid, efficient, and economical. Unscientific farming practices which depleted the soil, wasted land and labor, and neglected resources are now replaced by others based on scientific principles and practices. The science of plant breeding has made available pure seed stocks of improved, disease resistant, high yielding, high quality, adapted varieties. An old one-crop economy is now diversified farming in which livestock, row crops, and tree farming are achieving balanced use of our land resources.

All of these developments, plus mechanization, high capital investment, and virtual elimination of the small farm are part of the history of South Carolina agriculture during these 20th century years.

Some fifty years ago, a poet wrote sadly: "More and more men in our modern civilization drift out of Nature, out of sweet air, health, strength, beauty, into the cities. . . . Is here any prophet, any statesman, any leader who will, like Moses once led the Israelites out of Egyptian bondage, excite the human imagination and lead humanity back to Nature, to sunlight, to starlight, earthbreath, sweet air, beauty, gaiety, and health?"

Brain power and intellectual life are working intensely on the land now, applying the laws of nature and economics to seed, soil, plant, produce, working on frontiers of plant breeding, disease and insect problems, marketing, and all the vastly complex business of today's agriculture.

No better proof of this is needed than this gathering of distinguished agricultural scientists dedicating their efforts toward finding solutions to these very problems.

We've come a long way from those days when Eliza Lucas experimented with indigo, when rice plantations spawned an aristocratic culture in this coastal country, when cotton plantations and slave labor were synonymous terms, and when agricultural societies were the medium for exchanging information on experimental projects. But we have yet far to go, and that is your challenge and mine.

HISTORIC PRESERVATION AND THE LAND AND WATER CONSERVATION FUND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the bill passed by the Senate to increase the Land and Water Conservation Fund and to establish the National Historic Preservation Fund is among the most important pieces of legislation that we will have the opportunity to act on in this Congress. It provides the funds to protect our most precious and our most fragile resources—our land and our water and our cultural heritage.

The Land and Water Conservation Fund established in 1965 provides funds for the acquisition of lands administered by the Federal Government as recreation areas and for matching grants to State and local governments for planning, acquisition, and development of recreation lands and facilities. Fund revenues are derived primarily from the sale of Federal surplus property and Outer Continental Shelf mineral receipts.

The legislation is designed to take advantage of the rapid increase in mineral receipts from the leasing program and is a direct response to the increasing backlog of recreation land acquisition needs on both the Federal and State level.

The bill provides for an increase in the Land and Water Conservation Fund to $1 billion which is a crucial first step in catching up with the backlog of acquisition and recreation needs in this country. The National Park Service alone estimates it will need $638 million to complete its land acquisition backlog.

An important amendment to this bill offered by Senator BUCKLEY and Senator WILLIAMS will assure that where the recreation needs are the greatest, the money will be more available. By adjusting the allocation formula to provide that 75 percent of the money available to the State will be distributed on a need basis, we insure that in the densely populated areas of the east coast where green space and recreation is needed most and least available, that acquisition can proceed on a level in some way commensurate with the need.

There are some areas in this country where legislation especially suited to the complex problems of preservation of our resources is required; where simple acquisition cannot solve the problems. In the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the islands lying off the coast of Cape Cod require an innovative program of management which will allow the local residents to determine how to curb overdevelopment on privately owned lands.

In Boston, we have worked out a framework to protect the sites of the Revolutionary War period and at the same time leave ownership in the hands of those who have cared for these landmarks for 200 years. In the Connecticut River valley, a plan which provided areas of recreation as well as areas suitable for residential and commercial growth has been the subject of legislation at both the State and Federal level.

But the fact remains that there are thousands of places in this country where acquisition for the development of recreation areas is feasible and the most effective way to accomplish our goals. Those most expert in the field, the National Park Service and the agencies of the States themselves have identified these areas. Only the lack of sufficient funds has hampered this effort. And today we have an opportunity to begin turning that around.

There is no one today who would suggest that preservation of our resources is optional or that development of recreation areas is frivolous. We have lost a great deal of time by not authorizing adequate funding sooner; and we have lost some valuable resources that are not renewable. We can assure today that this tragic loss is not perpetuated.

Of all the depressing accounts of lost resources, one of the most distressing is the destruction of so much of our history as a nation. As testimony before the House Interior Subcommittee on National Parks and Recreation substantiates, over 50 percent of the 12,000 buildings listed in the Historic America Building Survey since 1933 have been destroyed. There is nothing we can do to bring those symbols of history back to life for our children. But we can see that this kind of senseless loss is stopped by providing the financial assistance crucial to the historic preservation effort.

By setting up the National Historic Preservation Fund to provide financial assistance to the States, we have not solved all the problems in historic preservation. We need a greater emphasis on planning the development of new methods of preservation, and greater support of local community preservation groups. But the financial assistance that the fund will provide is critical in demonstrating our commitment to preservation of our heritage.

Historic preservation is not building museums dedicated to the past. It is not making a showcase of relics and artifacts of our history. It is not cordoning off antique buildings and furniture. Historic preservation is breathing new life into our cities and making our birth and growth as a nation come alive for all our young people. Mr. Tersh Boasberg of Preservation Action pointed out in his testimony:

Fed by the national concern for environmental quality and the upsurge of Bicentennial interest, the preservation movement offers a real hope that our cities yet can stave off economic and social catastrophe. . . . Over 80 percent of our Nation now lives in urban areas. Our interest in historic preservation is no more or less than a concern for the quality of life in Twentieth Century urban America. For historic preservation means not only recognition of the values and landmarks of our past; but it means community renewal, economic development, and local progress for our future.

The action we take today in acting favorably on legislation to increase funding for historic, land, and water conservation is in no way inflationary; it is an investment in our future. It is not expenditure without gain; it is the acquisition and conservation of life-giving resources and the preservation of the finest moments of our past.

HISTORIC BROADCAST FROM THE SENATE CHAMBER

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, today is a historic occasion in the Senate for two reasons.

First, NELSON ROCKEFELLER is to be sworn in as the 41st Vice President of the United States. I join my colleagues in congratulating him. I voted for his confirmation and believe he will be an excellent addition to the executive branch.

Second, television cameras will be permitted in the Senate Chamber to transmit this important occasion to the American public. This will mark the first time in the history of the Senate that such broadcast coverage has been authorized. I commend Senator HUGH SCOTT and Senator ROBERT C. BYRD for their leadership in introducing Senate Resolution 452 which makes this possible.

Such experimentation with broadcast coverage of Senate Chamber proceedings, has considerable merit. It certainly is consistent with the objectives of Senate Resolution 447 introduced by Senators METCALF, HUGH SCOTT, ROBERT C. BYRD, GRAVEL, and myself. This resolution which incorporates the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations' Interim Report on Congress and Mass Communications, Senate Report 93-1275, provides for experimentation in broadcast coverage of regular Senate Chamber proceedings during the first session of the new Congress. Senator METCALF, the distinguished chairman of the joint committee, and I are extremely hopeful that expeditious action will be taken on this proposal in the 94th Congress.

In the December 21, 1974, issue of New Republic, an article entitled "Televising Congress" makes some excellent points in this area, and I believe it quite appropriate that it become part of the Record of this historic occasion. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

TELEVISION CONGRESS

Sen. Lee Metcalf of Montana, chairman of the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations, last week introduced a resolution that, if passed by the Senate, would authorize a year-long test of radio and television broadcasting of the upper chamber's floor debates. Ironically none of the three network television news shows that night (December 9) reported that fact, nor did The Washington Post or The New York Times the next morning. If Capitol Hill newsmen ignored the story because they thought Metcalf's resolution had no chance of being approved, they have another think coming. At the last minute Metcalf picked up as co-sponsors Sen. Robert Byrd, Democratic Whip of the Senate and de facto floor leader, and Sen. Hugh Scott, the Republican chief, Byrd and Scott are important for reasons beyond their leadership positions. Both are members of the nine-man Senate Rules Committee, which will take up the measure.

For years the major networks have been requesting the Senate and House to allow live coverage of major debates and votes. The rules in both bodies prohibiting such exposure were drawn up at a time when strong leaders such as Speaker Sam Rayburn resented having legislative deliberations under the camera's candid eye. The rules have remained untouched, though television has grown to be the prime news source for most Americans. As Presidents took to using television more and more to press their causes, Congress—an equal branch—was in no position to respond with equal force. Sen. Byrd has pointed out the incongruity: "Where a struggle exists over spending authority, the President can use television to veto a bill in full view of the American population—he can take what conceivably could be a private act and make it public. The subsequent Senate vote," Byrd went on, "to override or sustain the veto, however, cannot be seen by the general public, only by the 425 persons accommodated by the public gallery."

Watergate and the televised impeachment hearings of the House Judiciary Committee helped to demonstrate the power of TV to the Congress. To the surprise and pleasure of the House leadership, most of the committee members appeared on the screen as serious, thoughtful men and women. Prior to Mr. Nixon's resignation the House Democratic leadership—long opposed to the introduction of television—made final preparations to allow microphones and cameras to cover floor debate of the expected impeachment resolution. On the Senate side, with the active support of Robert Byrd and Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, it was a foregone conclusion that cameras would be on hand to televise the impeachment trial.

And yet an undercurrent of congressional opposition still runs against the type of coverage proposed by Metcalf. There is anxiety that the mere presence of cameras will turn Congress, as it has party conventions, into a "media event." There's anxiety that TV may force members to come to the floor when they should be doing committee work, or that network news programs may distort floor action by selective use of taped debates, or that cameras will focus on embarrassing situations.

Recognizing this, the Metcalf proposal sets up a test for one year, giving the Senate a chance to see how broadcasters use their new liberty. At first cameras in the Senate chamber would be turned on for a 60-day trial period, with receivers set up in strategic spots such as the Senate cloakroom and areas within the Capitol and Senate office buildings. After 60 days continuous television coverage would be initiated and networks and local broadcasters would be permitted to use excerpts from the tapes in news shows and documentaries. Live coverage would be allowed only in special situations.

In Florida and Connecticut public television broadcasts state legislative proceedings. Both states found that after a time the legislators managed to forget the cameras. No doubt when the cameras first appear on the Senate floor, they will be inhibiting. For a while, the old casualness, the few impromptu outbreaks in heated debate, the delays that permit compromise will be replaced by an attempt to appear more orderly. But as a former Senate official and now a Washington lawyer, Harry McPherson, told Metcalf's committee last spring, "I suspect that in time [Senators] will come to realize that their viewers, their voters, that some compromise is necessary in public life, as it is in private life. And that will free them to be the natural political animals they are."

A major unanswered question was raised by Rep. Claude Pepper of Florida at the Metcalf hearings. "There might come a time that we found abuse," he said, "that we found [the networks] were only putting the Democrats on, only putting the Republicans on, and not giving fair coverage." To Pepper, opening the Senate floor to television cameras is a "privilege" to be granted by Congress to the networks, not a right. And for that "privilege," the networks, he believes, should be held accountable for their coverage. If there is one long-term journalistic danger in the Metcalf plan, it is precisely that network newsmen would be held accountable to Senate-approved "procedures" to ensure that broadcast coverage is carried out in a nonpartisan manner and is fair and equitable in recording the views of members participating in floor proceedings."

RETIREMENT OF PORTER MORGAN WARD

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, Mr. Porter M. Ward, a close, personal friend of mine long before he became a staff member of the Senate's Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, will retire at the end of this year. He thus completes 18 years of faithful service on Capitol Hill.

During the 8 years he worked as my press secretary, he was always dependable under the pressures of a heavy load and never missed a deadline. It was here that he developed the reputation for pounding the "fastest typewriter in the West." I will always be grateful for the service he rendered me.

Before coming to Washington as my press secretary in 1957, Porter Ward had already distinguished himself in the field of journalism. He literally cut his eye teeth on newspapers in the State of Washington, moving on to bureau chief for the United Press International in Spokane, Wash. and then Portland, Oreg. He was also managing editor of the Lewiston, Idaho, Tribune, a newspaper of great reputation, not only in Idaho but throughout the whole of the Northwest.

During World War II, Porter served in the Counter Intelligence Corps, assigned to duty in the Far East.

Following the war, Porter returned to Idaho, where, for several years, he was a prominent legislative newscaster, as well as the author, director and producer of dramatized stories of our State's rugged and colorful history.

Porter headed up his own public relations firm in Boise, before coming to Washington.

Since he signed on as a professional staff member of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, Porter Ward has made significant contributions to the successful enactment of landmark legislation relating to outdoor recreation. Major bills to which he has given particular attention have established: a Nationwide System of Trails, a National Wild and Scenic Rivers System, and the Sawtooth National Recreation Area. More recently, he has worked on the bill to create a Hells Canyon National Recreation Area, which has passed the Senate but still remains to be considered by the House. These are the most important bills, but they do not embrace countless others which required and received his skillful handling since he became the Interior Committee's staff man for the Public Lands Subcommittee.

One of Porter's principal contributions to the committee and, in my judgment, to the conservation movement, was facilitating the procedure by which new wilderness areas are added to the National Wilderness Preservation System. He joined the staff after the enactment, in 1964, of the Wilderness Act, just before the committee had to work out procedures for adding new tracts to the basic system created by the original bill. As the administration began submitting its proposals for such additions to Congress, as required by the law, Porter Ward, more than anyone else, helped set up the ground rules by which these areas are assessed for inclusion in permanent wilderness for the benefit of future generations of Americans.

Porter was also very helpful in implementing legislative considerations of amendments to the Initial Land and Water Conservation Fund Act. This measure, in my opinion, has provided the means by which we will attain our goal of furnishing the people with adequate outdoor recreational facilities through coordinated action at the National, State and local levels.

In addition to his legislative duties, Porter Ward was also the committee press liaison officer. In this capacity, his warm and wonderful personality was of great help to the committee. He was liked and admired by all those who dealt with him, including the staff, the general public and the media. His easy-going manner and personal charm proved to be a tremendous asset during the years when the committee considered and approved milestone legislation relating to our great outdoors.

For his services, we are in his debt. And as he leaves for a much-deserved retirement, I want to wish him the best of everything. I hope the years ahead are happy, and I am glad that he will be close by where we can call upon him, from time to time, for good counsel.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, earlier in this session, I was pleased to see the enactment of a major reform and expansion of the Federal bilingual education law.

The provisions ultimately adopted in H.R. 69 by the Congress and signed into law by the President, Public Law 93-380, represent the combination of bills which I originally introduced with Senator CRANSTON. On October 9, 1973, I introduced S. 2552, the Bilingual Education Reform Act of 1973 and Senator CRANSTON introduced S. 2553, the Bilingual Education Amendments of 1973. Both bills were cosponsored by Senator MONTANA.

This was the first substantive review of the original bilingual education legislation enacted in 1967. It followed a series of evaluations conducted by the General Accounting Office, by the Select Committee on Equal Educational Opportunity and the U.S. Civil Rights Commission as well as reports from organizations and groups with special concerns in the field of bilingual education.

Following a hearing of the Senate Education Subcommittee, a measure combining the features of the legislation Senator CRANSTON and I had introduced was drafted. That measure was included in the Senate version of H.R. 69 and, to a significant degree, its provisions were adopted by the House-Senate conference and enacted into law.

Our action came with the knowledge that existing Federal programs were serving only a small percentage of the limited English-speaking students in need of the program. Whether the administration estimate of 1.8 to 2.5 million children as the target group, or the U.S. Civil Rights Commission estimate of 5 million children is used, the number served by bilingual education programs, whether funded by Federal, State, or local entities, is pitifully small.

Coming in the wake of the Lau decision, we felt it was essential to stress not only an increase in the number of programs funded by the Federal Government but to expand dramatically the development of the human and material resources necessary for a quantum jump in local and State supported bilingual education programs.

Thus, the new provisions of the law represent a new congressional mandate to support the preparation and training of teachers, administrators, counselors, paraprofessionals and other resource bilingual education personnel.

At least $16 million of the first $70 million appropriated is to be directed to these purposes as well as one-third of all appropriations in excess of $70 million. It is my expectation that this reservation will be in addition to funds used for the purpose of preservice and inservice training under the 15 percent requirement of section 721(b) (2) (B).

I also am pleased that the conferees maintained the fellowship provisions of the bill, a minimum of 100, and I would expect that this program will quickly become an aid in the preparation of the college-level bilingual teaching staff necessary to prepare teachers for elementary and secondary school bilingual programs.

It is clear from the testimony we received that there is a compelling need for additional bilingual education teachers across the Nation.

The definition of a bilingual education program was revised and section 703 (a) (4) (A) now recognizes that in order for limited English speaking children to progress through the educational system and to have the same opportunities as their English speaking counterparts, they must have instruction in their native language and the courses must be given with full appreciation of the culture of the children.

The definition of a bilingual program turns away from the English as a second language approach except where TESOL is part of a full bilingual program in which the native language of the child of limited English-speaking ability is used to transfer skills and to acquire knowledge and where the limited English-speaking child—as most educators recommend—is or becomes literate in his native language and then transfers that literacy to English. It includes as well full appreciation of the culture of the child in aspects of the program.

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission outlined the concepts that were included in a new definition of a bilingual education program, concepts which I read to the conferees in arguing for the basic elements of the new definition. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concepts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Using the native language to teach other subjects allows the child's education to continue uninterruptedly from home to school. This permits immediate progress in concept building and learning subject matter rather than postponing these important areas until a second language is learned. It thus eliminates the situation which leads to such unsound practices as requiring non-English speakers, as a matter of course, to repeat the first grade to learn more English—a practice the Commission found commonly used in the five Southwestern States with regard to Mexican American children.

2. Teaching a child to read first in the language he brings with him facilitates his learning to read and write in a second language because the basic skills of reading are generally transferable from one language to another. Many linguists and educators hold as axiomatic that the best medium for teaching is the mother tongue. To quote Drs. Trolke and Saville of the Center for Applied Linguistics: "Recent experiences in many places prove that an equal or better command of the second language is achieved if school begins with the native language as a medium of instruction and introduces the second language gradually."

3. Curriculum which incorporates the students' familiar experiences, community, history, and cultural heritage will help build pride and self confidence in the student, and by being more relevant to the student's personal experiences heighten his interest and motivation in school. This principle is one the Commission has stressed in its recommendations on Mexican American education. Because language is so much a part of culture, a program which utilizes the child's native tongue can more fully incorporate his or her cultural background. Other language programs, designed simply to impart a knowledge of English to non-English speaking students are not as likely to successfully foster personal identification and self-worth in language minority students.

4. By integrating the language and cultural background of all students, bilingual-bicultural education reinforces and increases the communication between home and school. When schools communicate with parents in a language they can understand, when parental input into school programs is solicited and efforts are made to include parents in school activities, they will become more responsive and will play a more active role in the education of their children. This in turn will have a positive effect on the students' motivation and achievement.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the inclusion of the native language and culture is basic to the concept of bilingual education. Further, educational research bears out the necessity for instruction in the native language and inclusion of the native culture in any child's intellectual development. These factors also were considered by the conferees prior to reaching a final decision.

Research conducted by the Civil Rights Commission shows that learning through the native language and culture are especially critical as the child is first learning concepts and developing basic skills. The use of the native language usually facilitates the development of reading skills, since the child is better able to learn to read in a language he or she already understands. Children similarly are better able to develop oral fluency in their native language. In addition, the full development and respect for a child's language has a direct bearing on his or her conceptual development, since language is the major vehicle of learning.

Inclusion of a child's cultural background in the basic curriculum is as important as native language instruction, since relevant curricula increase the chance that students will take an interest in and effectively learn from materials presented.

A student's attitude toward himself and learning is an important determinant in his or her success in school and in second language learning. This further testifies to the value of bilingual education, since the inclusion of a child's native language and culture enhances the development of a positive attitude through reinforcement in the school of the child's personal experience and background.

The superiority of bilingual education programs in developing fully the native language of the child while enhancing the learning of English has been evident in a number of case studies by the U.S. Civil Rights Commissions.

In San Francisco, Calif., for example, where 135 children are enrolled in a bilingual program for grades 1-3, Chinese students, many of whom are recent immigrants, in the bilingual program, scored 1½ years ahead of students in the district ESL programs in reading and mathematics. In addition, they scored 1 year ahead of all students in the district, and 5 months ahead of the national norm for third graders.

The "Arriba" program, which provides bilingual education for pupils in grades 3-12 in several schools in Philadelphia, Pa., shows that the dropout rate of language minority pupils can be greatly reduced as a side effect of bilingual education.

Of the percentage of Spanish-dominant pupils graduating in 1973 who had been in the program since the 10th grade, participating students were four times as likely to graduate as were Spanish-dominant pupils in the same school but who were not participating. City-wide, Spanish-dominant pupils in the program were nearly twice as likely to graduate as were nonparticipating Spanish-dominant pupils.

A fiscal year 1973 evaluation report from the Rock Point, Ariz., bilingual program for Navajo students indicated that at the end of the second grade, students taught to read in Navajo and English showed an average level of achievement on the Stanford achievement test of 2 months higher than the average student in the Chinle Agency BIA schools. These students also passed a Navajo reading comprehension test with 98-percent accuracy, indicating that the Rock Point children can operate in English as well as those children in predominantly monolingual English programs and they have learned to read and write as well. Navajo first graders taught bilingually are at the end of first grade already working with second grade arithmetic materials.

One of the most successful programs which has changed both community sentiment toward the program and toward second language learning is the bilingual program in Johnstown, Colo. In October of the first year of operation, questionnaires were sent out to community members regarding their sentiments toward the program or toward their child being in the program. Responses indicated that around 80 percent of the community was not in favor of such a program. However, the superintendent backed the program strongly. It was he who insisted that the program must have a significant proportion of English-speaking students of the community benefiting in order to succeed. The program consists of 50 percent Spanish speaking—chicano—and 50 percent English speaking. The program was well planned, with a great deal of emphasis placed on reading skills. Last year another attitudinal survey was made of the community of Johnstown. The results showed a total reversal of community attitudes with almost 70 percent of the respondents in favor of the program. However, more impressive than this is to see children of both groups communicating amicably and proficiently in both languages, according to program evaluators.

The new law permits funding of preschool, elementary, and secondary school programs, although it was the expectation of the Congress that the vast majority of the funds for programs would go to the early elementary school grades.

In addition, the law stresses a new bilingual research requirement for the National Institute of Education to be conducted concurrently with the Office of Bilingual Education. The Office itself was upgraded from its previous designation as a division and the change was specifically designed to provide direct communication between the director of the Office and the Commissioner of Education.

In addition, a national review of the program and a study of national needs along with an estimate of a 5-year program for meeting those needs is to be prepared by November 1, 1975.

The program also provides an incentive for State educational agencies to become more active in the area of bilingual education.

Overall, the title VII program has been extended through fiscal year 1977 with authorizations climbing to $160 million in that year. Separate authorizations in addition to that amount are provided for State administration and research.

In the original legislation, I introduced separate amendments which were included to remedy the traditional lack of attention to the special needs of the limited English speaking in other federally supported education programs. Most of these provisions were retained in the final law. Thus, in both adult education and library services programs, new attention must be directed at the needs of the limited English speaking.

In the area of vocational education, a new program with an authorization of $17.5 million was accepted. It would be designed to multiply across the country many of the innovations that have been developed in Massachusetts and certain other States.

An equal level of funding was approved for a vocational training program aimed at those individuals who have dropped out of school.

In addition, State vocational education plans submitted to the Federal Government under the vocational education law, must recognize the needs of limited English-speaking students within their States, and State and national advisory commissions must include membership from these populations.

The interest in the Congress in this program has been expressed recently in its action this year on appropriations measures. Although the administration originally requested a decrease from last year's $53 million level of funding to $35 million, it doubled that request to $70 million following the Lau decision. The Senate approved $90 million and the House-Senate conference on the supplemental appropriations bill accepted $85 million.

Mr. President, because of the interest in this program, I ask unanimous consent that appropriate provisions of Public Law 93-380 and of the conference report accompanying H.R. 69, be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PROVISIONS OF PUBLIC LAW 93-380 EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1974 AFFECTING BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"PART A—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS
"BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"Sec. 721. (a) Funds available for grants under this part shall be used for—

"(1) the establishment, operation, and improvement of programs of bilingual education;

"(2) auxiliary and supplementary community and educational activities designed to facilitate and expand the implementation of programs described in clause (1), including such activities as (A) adult education programs related to the purposes of this title, particularly for parents of children participating in programs of bilingual education, and carried out, where appropriate, in coordination with programs assisted under the Adult Education Act, and (B) preschool programs preparatory and supplementary to bilingual education programs;

"(3) (A) the establishment, operation, and improvement of training programs for personnel preparing to participate in, or personnel participating in, the conduct of programs of bilingual education and (B) auxiliary and supplementary training programs, which shall be included in each program of bilingual education, for personnel preparing to participate in, or personnel participating in, the conduct of such programs; and

"(4) planning, and providing technical assistance for, and taking other steps leading to the development of, such programs.

"(b) (1) A grant may be made under this section only upon application therefor by one or more local educational agencies or by an institution of higher education, including a junior or community college, applying jointly with one or more local educational agencies (or, in the case of a training activity in clause (3) (A) of subsection (a) of this section, by eligible applicants as defined in section 723). Each such application shall be made to the Commissioner at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commissioner deems necessary, and

"(A) include a description of the activities set forth in one or more of the clauses of subsection (a) which the applicant desires to carry out; and

"(B) provide evidence that the activities so described will make substantial progress toward making programs of bilingual education available to the children having need thereof in the area served by the applicant.

"(2) An application for a grant under this part may be approved only if—

"(A) the provision of assistance proposed in the application is consistent with criteria established by the Commissioner, after consultation with the State educational agency, for the purpose of achieving an equitable distribution of assistance under this part within the State in which the applicant is located, which criteria shall be developed by his taking into consideration (1) the geographic distribution of children of limited English-speaking ability, (2) the relative need of persons in different geographic areas within the State for the kinds of services and activities described in subsection (a), (3) with respect to grants to carry out programs described in clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of section 721, the relative ability of particular local educational agencies within the State to provide such services and activities, and (4) with respect to such grants, the relative numbers of persons from low-income families sought to be benefited by such programs;

"(B) in the case of applications from local educational agencies to carry out programs of bilingual education under clause (1) of subsection (a) of section 721, the Commissioner determines that not less than 15 per centum of the amounts paid to the applicant for the purposes of such programs shall be expended for auxiliary and supplementary training programs in accordance with the provisions of clause (3) (B) of such subsection and section 723;

"(C) the Commissioner determines (1) that the program will use the most qualified available personnel and the best resources and will substantially increase the educational opportunities for children of limited English-speaking ability in the area to be served by the applicant, and (2) that, to the extent consistent with the number of children enrolled in nonprofit, nonpublic schools in the area to be served whose educational needs are of the type which the program is intended to meet, provision has been made for participation of such children; and

"(D) the State educational agency has been notified of the application and has been given the opportunity to offer recommendations thereon to the applicant and to the Commissioner.

"(3) (A) Upon an application from a State educational agency, the Commissioner shall make provision for the submission and approval of a State program for the coordination by such State agency of technical assistance to programs of bilingual education in such State assisted under this title. Such State program shall contain such provisions, agreements, and assurances as the Commissioner shall, by regulation, determine necessary and proper to achieve the purposes of this title, including assurances that funds made available under this section for any fiscal year will be so used as to supplement, and to the extent practical, increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of such funds be made available by the State for the purposes described in this section, and in no case to supplant such funds.

"(B) Except as is provided in the second sentence of this subparagraph, the Commissioner shall pay from the amounts authorized for these purposes pursuant to section 702 for each fiscal year to each State educational agency which has a State program submitted and approved under subparagraph (A) such sums as may be necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of such State program. The amount paid by the Commissioner to any State educational agency under the preceding sentence for any fiscal year shall not exceed 5 per centum of the aggregate of the amounts paid under this part to local educational agencies in the State of such State educational agency in the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year in which this limitation applies.

"(c) In determining the distribution of funds under this title, the Commissioner shall give priority to areas having the greatest need for programs assisted under this title.

"INDIAN CHILDREN IN SCHOOLS

"Sec. 722. (a) For the purpose of carrying out programs under this part for individuals served by elementary and secondary schools operated predominantly for Indian children, a nonprofit institution or organization of the Indian tribe concerned which operates any such school and which is approved by the Commissioner for the purposes of this section may be considered to be a local educational agency as such term is used in this title.

"(b) From the sums appropriated pursuant to section 702(b), the Commissioner is authorized to make payments to the Secretary of the Interior to carry out programs of bilingual education for children on reservations served by elementary and secondary schools for Indian children operated or funded by the Department of the Interior. The terms upon which payments for such purpose may be made to the Secretary of the Interior shall be determined pursuant to such criteria as the Commissioner determines will best carry out the policy of section 702(a).

"(c) The Secretary of the Interior shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of each year, shall submit to the Congress and the President an annual report detailing a review and evaluation of the use, during the preceding fiscal year, of all funds paid to him by the Commissioner under subsection (b) of this section, including complete fiscal reports, a description of the personnel and information paid for in whole or in part with such funds, the allocation of such funds, and the status of all programs funded from such payments. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to relieve the Director of any authority or obligation under this part.

"(d) The Secretary of the Interior shall, together with the information required in the preceding subsection, submit to the Congress and the President, an assessment of the needs of Indian children with respect to the purposes of this title in schools operated or funded by the Department of the Interior, including those State educational agencies and local educational agencies receiving assistance under the Johnson-O'Malley Act (25 U.S.C. 452 et seq.) and an assessment of the extent to which such needs are being met by funds provided to such schools for educational purposes through the Secretary of the Interior.

"TRAINING

"Sec. 723. (a) (1) In carrying out the provisions of clauses (1) and (3) of subsection (a) of section 721, with respect to training, the Commissioner shall, through grants to, and contracts with, eligible applicants, as defined in subsection (b), provide for—

"(A) (i) training, carried out in coordination with any other programs training auxiliary educational personnel, designed (1) to prepare personnel to participate in, or for personnel participating in, the conduct of programs of bilingual education, including programs emphasizing opportunities for career development, advancement, and lateral mobility, (2) to train teachers, administrators, paraprofessionals, teacher aides, and parents, and (3) to train persons to teach and counsel such persons, and (ii) special training programs designed (1) to meet individual needs, and (2) to encourage reform, innovation, and improvement in applicable education curricula in graduate education, in the structure of the academic profession, and in recruitment and retention of higher education and graduate school facilities, as related to bilingual education; and

"(B) the operation of short-term training institutes designed to improve the skills of participants in programs of bilingual education in order to facilitate their effectiveness in carrying out responsibilities in connection with such programs.

"(2) In addition the Commissioner is authorized to award fellowships for study in the field of training teachers for bilingual education. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, not less than 100 fellowships leading to a graduate degree shall be awarded under the preceding sentence for preparing individuals to train teachers for programs of bilingual education. Such fellowships shall be awarded in proportion to the need for teachers of various groups of individuals with limited English-speaking ability. For each fiscal year after June 30, 1975, and prior to July 1, 1978, the Commissioner shall report to the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate on the number of fellowships in the field of training teachers for bilingual education which he recommends will be necessary for that fiscal year.

"(3) The Commissioner shall include in the terms of any arrangement described in paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section provisions for the payment, to persons participating in training programs so described, of such stipends (including allowances for subsistence and other expenses for such persons and their dependents) as he may determine to be consistent with prevailing practices under comparable federally supported programs.

"(4) In making grants or contracts under this section, the Commissioner shall give priority to eligible applicants with demonstrated competence and experience in the field of bilingual education. Funds provided under grants or contracts for training activities described in this section to or with a State educational agency, separately or jointly, shall in no event exceed in the aggregate in any fiscal year 15 per centum of the total amount of funds obligated for training activities pursuant to clauses (1) and (3) of subsection (a) of section 721 in such year.

"(5) An application for a grant or contract for preservice or inservice training activities described in clause (A) (i) (I) and clause (A) (ii) (I) and in subsection (a) (1) (B) of this section shall be considered an application for a program of bilingual education for the purposes of subsection (a) (4) (E) of section 703.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, the term 'eligible applicants' means—

"(1) institutions of higher education (including junior colleges and community colleges) which apply, after consultation with, or jointly with, one or more local educational agencies;

"(2) local educational agencies; and

"(3) State educational agencies.

"PART B—ADMINISTRATION

"OFFICE OF BILINGUAL EDUCATION"

"Sec. 731. (a) There shall be, in the Office of Education, an Office of Bilingual Education (hereafter in this section referred to as the 'Office') through which the Commissioner shall carry out his functions relating to bilingual education.

"(b) (1) The Office shall be headed by a Director of Bilingual Education, appointed by the Commissioner, to whom the Commissioner shall delegate all of his delegable functions relating to bilingual education.

"(2) The Office shall be organized as the Director determines to be appropriate in order to enable him to carry out his functions and responsibilities effectively.

"(c) The Commissioner, in consultation with the Council, shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of 1975, and of 1977, shall submit to the Congress and the President a report on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and the administration and operation of this title and of other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability. Such report shall include—

"(1) a national assessment of the educational needs of children and other persons with limited English-speaking ability and of the extent to which such needs are being met from Federal, State, and local efforts, including (A) not later than July 1, 1977, the results of a survey of the number of such children and persons in the States, and (B) a plan, including cost estimates, to be carried out during the five-year period beginning on such date, for extending programs of bilingual education and bilingual vocational and adult education programs to all such preschool and elementary school children and other persons of limited English-speaking ability, including a phased plan for the training of the necessary teachers and other educational personnel necessary for such purpose;

"(2) a report on and an evaluation of the activities carried out under this title during the preceding fiscal year and the extent to which each of such activities achieves the policy set forth in section 702(a);

"(3) a statement of the activities intended to be carried out during the succeeding period, including an estimate of the cost of such activities;

"(4) an assessment of the number of teachers and other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education under this title and those carried out under other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability and a statement describing the activities carried out thereunder designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs, and the number of other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education in the States and a statement describing the activities carried out under this title designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs; and

"(5) a description of the personnel, the functions of such personnel, and information available at the regional offices of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare dealing with bilingual programs within that region.

"NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"Sec. 732. (a) Subject to part D of the General Education Provisions Act, there shall be a National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education composed of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary, one of whom he shall designate as Chairman. At least eight of the members of the Council shall be persons experienced in dealing with the educational problems of children and other persons who are of limited English-speaking ability, at least one of whom shall be representative of persons serving on boards of education operating programs of bilingual education. At least three members shall be experienced in the training of teachers in programs of bilingual education. At least two members shall be persons with general experience in the field of elementary and secondary education. At least two members shall be classroom teachers of demonstrated teaching abilities using bilingual methods and techniques. The members of the Council shall be appointed in such a way as to be generally representative of the significant segments of the population of persons of limited English-speaking ability and the geographic areas in which they reside.

"(b) The Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman, but, notwithstanding the provisions of section 446(a) of the General Education Provisions Act, not less often than four times in each year.

"(c) The Council shall advise the Commissioner in the preparation of general regulations and with respect to policy matters arising in the administration and operation of this title, including the development of criteria for approval of applications, and plans under this title, and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability. The Council shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of each year, submit a report to the Congress and the President on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and on the administration and operation of this title, including those items specified in section 731(c), and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability.

"(d) The Commissioner shall procure temporary and intermittent services of such personnel as are necessary for the conduct of the functions of the Council, in accordance with section 445, of the General Education Provisions Act, and shall make available to the Council such staff, information, and other assistance as it may require to carry out its activities effectively.

"PART C—SUPPORTIVE SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES

"ADMINISTRATION

"Sec. 741. (a) The provisions of this part shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary, in consultation with—

"(1) the Commissioner, through the Office of Bilingual Education; and

"(2) the Director of the National Institute of Education, notwithstanding the second sentence of section 405(b) (1) of the General Education Provisions Act; in accordance with regulations.

"(b) The Assistant Secretary shall, in accordance with clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a), develop and promulgate regulations for this part and then delegate his functions under this part, as may be appropriate under the terms of section 742.

"RESEARCH AND DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS

"Sec. 742. (a) The National Institute of Education shall, in accordance with the provisions of section 405 of the General Education Provisions Act, carry out a program of research in the field of bilingual education in order to enhance the effectiveness of bilingual education programs carried out under this title and other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability.

"(b) In order to test the effectiveness of research findings by the National Institute of Education and to demonstrate new or innovative practices, techniques, and methods for use in such bilingual education programs, the Director and the Commissioner are authorized to make competitive contracts with public and private educational agencies, institutions, and organizations for such purpose.

"(c) In carrying out their responsibilities under this section, the Commissioner and the Director shall, through competitive contracts with appropriate public and private agencies, institutions, and organizations—

"(1) undertake studies to determine the basic educational needs and language acquisition characteristics of, and the most effective conditions for, educating children of limited English-speaking ability;

"(b) (1) The Office shall be headed by a Director of Bilingual Education, appointed by the Commissioner, to whom the Commissioner shall delegate all of his delegable functions relating to bilingual education.

"(2) The Office shall be organized as the Director determines to be appropriate in order to enable him to carry out his functions and responsibilities effectively.

"(c) The Commissioner, in consultation with the Council, shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of 1975, and of 1977, shall submit to the Congress and the President a report on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and the administration and operation of this title and of other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability. Such report shall include—

"(1) a national assessment of the educational needs of children and other persons with limited English-speaking ability and of the extent to which such needs are being met from Federal, State, and local efforts, including (A) not later than July 1, 1977, the results of a survey of the number of such children and persons in the States, and (B) a plan, including cost estimates, to be carried out during the five-year period beginning on such date, for extending programs of bilingual education and bilingual vocational and adult education programs to all such preschool and elementary school children and other persons of limited English-speaking ability, including a phased plan for the training of the necessary teachers and other educational personnel necessary for such purpose;

"(2) a report on and an evaluation of the activities carried out under this title during the preceding fiscal year and the extent to which each of such activities achieves the policy set forth in section 702(a);

"(3) a statement of the activities intended to be carried out during the succeeding period, including an estimate of the cost of such activities;

"(4) an assessment of the number of teachers and other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education under this title and those carried out under other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability and a statement describing the activities carried out thereunder designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs, and the number of other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education in the States and a statement describing the activities carried out under this title designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs; and

"(5) a description of the personnel, the functions of such personnel, and information available at the regional offices of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare dealing with bilingual programs within that region.

"NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"Sec. 732. (a) Subject to part D of the General Education Provisions Act, there shall be a National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education composed of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary, one of whom he shall designate as Chairman. At least eight of the members of the Council shall be persons experienced in dealing with the educational problems of children and other persons who are of limited English-speaking ability, at least one of whom shall be representative of persons serving on boards of education operating programs of bilingual education. The Council shall prepare and, not later than November 1 of each year, submit a report to the Congress and the President on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and on the administration and operation of this title, including those items specified in section 731(c), and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability.

"(d) The Commissioner shall procure temporary and intermittent services of such personnel as are necessary for the conduct of the functions of the Council, in accordance with section 445, of the General Education Provisions Act, and shall make available to the Council such staff, information, and other assistance as it may require to carry out its activities effectively.

"PART C—SUPPORTIVE SERVICES AND ACTIVITIES

"ADMINISTRATION

"Sec. 741. (a) The provisions of this part shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary, in consultation with—

"(1) the Commissioner, through the Office of Bilingual Education; and

"(2) the Director of the National Institute of Education, notwithstanding the second sentence of section 405(b) (1) of the General Education Provisions Act; in accordance with regulations.

"(b) The Assistant Secretary shall, in accordance with clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a), develop and promulgate regulations for this part and then delegate his functions under this part, as may be appropriate under the terms of section 742.

"RESEARCH AND DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS

"Sec. 742. (a) The National Institute of Education shall, in accordance with the provisions of section 405 of the General Education Provisions Act, carry out a program of research in the field of bilingual education in order to enhance the effectiveness of bilingual education programs carried out under this title and other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability.

"(b) In order to test the effectiveness of research findings by the National Institute of Education and to demonstrate new or innovative practices, techniques, and methods for use in such bilingual education programs, the Director and the Commissioner are authorized to make competitive contracts with public and private educational agencies, institutions, and organizations for such purpose.

"(c) In carrying out their responsibilities under this section, the Commissioner and the Director shall, through competitive contracts with appropriate public and private agencies, institutions, and organizations—

"(1) undertake studies to determine the basic educational needs and language acquisition characteristics of, and the most effective conditions for, educating children of limited English-speaking ability;

December 19, 1974

"(2) develop and disseminate instructional materials and equipment suitable for use in bilingual education programs; and

"(3) establish and operate a national clearinghouse of information for bilingual education, which shall collect, analyze, and disseminate information about bilingual education and such bilingual education and related programs.

"(d) In carrying out their responsibilities under this section, the Commissioner and the Director shall provide for periodic consultation with representatives of State and local educational agencies and appropriate groups and organizations involved in bilingual education.

"(e) There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year prior to July 1, 1978, $5,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this section."

"(2) (A) The amendment made by this subsection shall be effective upon the date of enactment of this Act, except that the provisions of part A of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (as amended by subsection (a) of this section) shall become effective on July 1, 1975, and the provisions of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 in effect immediately prior to the date of enactment of this Act shall remain in effect through June 30, 1975, to the extent not inconsistent with the amendment made by this section.

"(B) The National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education, for which provision is made in section 732 of such Act, shall be appointed within ninety days after the enactment of this Act.

"(b) Section 703(a) of title VII of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(8) The term 'other programs for persons of limited English-speaking ability' when used in sections 731 and 732 means the program authorized by section 708(c) of the Emergency School Aid Act and the programs carried out in coordination with the provisions of this title pursuant to section 122(a)(4)(C) and part J of the Vocational Education Act of 1963, and section 306(a)(11) of the Adult Education Act, and programs and projects serving areas with high concentrations of persons of limited English-speaking ability pursuant to section 6(b)(4) of the Library Services and Construction Act."

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Sec. 106. Title VIII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by inserting after section 803 the following new section:

"STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS ON REFUND OF PAYMENTS

"Sec. 804. No State or local educational agency shall be liable to refund any payment made to such agency under this Act (including title I of this Act) which was subsequently determined to be unauthorized by law, if such payment was made more than five years before such agency received final written notice that such payment was unauthorized."

DROPOUT PREVENTION PROJECTS

Sec. 107. (a) Section 807(c) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "and each of the five succeeding fiscal years."

DEVELOPING INSTITUTIONS AMENDMENT

Sec. 832. Section 302(a)(2) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Commissioner is authorized to waive three years of the requirements set forth in clause (C) of paragraph (1) in the case of applications for grants under this title by institutions if the Commissioner determines such action will substantially increase higher education for Spanish-speaking people."

BILINGUAL EDUCATION AMENDMENTS

Sec. 833. (a) (1) Clause (B) of section 417 B(b)(3) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended by inserting "(1)" after the word "who" and by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a backgrounds, as determined in accordance with criteria prescribed by the Commissioner, to undertake training for the legal profession.

"(b) Grants made, and contracts entered into, under subsection (a) may cover, in accordance with regulations of the Commissioner, all or part of the cost of—

"(1) selecting individuals from disadvantaged backgrounds for training for the legal profession,

"(2) facilitating the entry of such individuals into institutions of higher education for the purpose of pursuing such training,

"(3) providing counseling or other services designed to assist such individuals to complete successfully such training,

"(4) providing, for not more than three months prior to the entry of such individuals upon their courses of training for the legal profession, preliminary training for such individuals designed to assist them to complete successfully such training for the legal profession,

"(5) paying such stipends (including allowances for travel and for dependents) as the Commissioner may determine for such individuals for any such period of preliminary training or for any period of training for the legal profession during which such individuals maintain satisfactory academic proficiency, as determined by the Commissioner, and

"(6) paying for administrative activities of the agencies and organizations which receive such grants, or with which such contracts are entered into, to the extent such activities are for the purpose of furthering activities described in clauses (1) through (5).

"(c) The activities authorized under this section may be carried out without regard to the requirements and limitations set forth in sections 962 and 963 of this part."

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall become effective on September 1, 1974.

COMMUNITY COLLEGE AND OCCUPATIONAL EDUCATION AMENDMENT

Sec. 837. Section 1001(b)(1) is amended by striking out "1974" and inserting in lieu thereof "1975".

PART D—OTHER MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

AMENDMENTS TO THE LIBRARY SERVICES AND CONSTRUCTION ACT AND THE VOCATIONAL EDUCATION ACT OF 1963 RELATING TO BILINGUAL EDUCATION AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Sec. 841. (a) (1) Section 102 of the Vocational Education Act of 1963 is amended by redesignating subsection (c), and all references thereto, as subsection (d), and by adding after subsection (b) thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) There are authorized to be appropriated $17,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, for the purpose of carrying out section 122(a)(4)(C). Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to affect the availability for such purpose of appropriations made pursuant to subsection (a)."

"(2) Clause (D) of section 104(a)(1) of such Act is amended by inserting before the comma at the end thereof the following: "and of persons of limited English-speaking ability (as defined in section 703(a) of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965)".

"(3) Clause (A)(vii) of section 104(b)(1) of such Act is amended by inserting before the comma at the end thereof the following: "(and may include, where appropriate, students who are persons of limited English-speaking ability (as defined in section 703(a) of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965))".

"(4) Section 108 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(14) The term 'vocational training' means training or retraining which is conducted as part of a program designed to prepare individuals for gainful employment as semiskilled or skilled workers or technicians or subprofessionals in recognized occupations and in new and emerging occupations, but excluding any program to prepare individuals for employment in occupations which the Commissioner determines, and specifies by regulation, to be generally considered professional which requires a baccalaureate or higher degree; such term includes guidance and counseling (either individually or through group instruction) in connection with such training or for the purpose of facilitating occupational choices; instruction related to the occupation or occupations to which the students are in training or instruction necessary for students to benefit from such training; the training of persons engaged as or preparing to become, instructors in a vocational training program; travel of students and vocational training personnel while engaged in a training program; and the acquisition, maintenance, and repair of instructional supplies, aids, and equipment, but such term does not include the construction, acquisition, or initial equipment of buildings or the acquisition or rental of land.

"(15) The term 'postsecondary educational institution' means a nonprofit institution legally authorized to provide postsecondary education within a State for persons sixteen years of age or older, who have graduated from or left elementary or secondary school."

"(3) (A) Clause (4) of section 122(a) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(C) vocational education for students of limited English-speaking ability (as defined in section 703(a) of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965) carried out in coordination with bilingual education programs under such title VII and bilingual adult education programs under section 306(a)(11) of the Adult Education Act."

"(b) Section 191 of such Act, and all references thereto, is redesignated as section 189.

"(7) Title I of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART J—BILINGUAL VOCATIONAL TRAINING

"STATEMENT OF FINDINGS

"Sec. 191. The Congress hereby finds that one of the most acute problems in the United States is that which involves millions of citizens, both children and adults, whose efforts to profit from vocational training is severely restricted by their limited English-speaking ability because they come from environments where the dominant language is other than English; that such persons are therefore unable to help to fill the critical need for more and better trained personnel in vital occupational categories; and that such persons are unable to make their maximum contribution to the Nation's economy and must, in fact, suffer the hardships of unemployment or underemployment. The Congress further finds that there is a critical shortage of instructors possessing both the job knowledge and skills and the dual language capabilities required for adequate vocational instruction of such language-handicapped persons, and a corresponding shortage of instructional materials and of instructional methods and techniques suitable for such instruction.

"GENERAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE COMMISSIONER

"Sec. 192. (a) The Commissioner and the Secretary of Labor together shall—

"(1) develop and disseminate accurate information on the status of bilingual vocational training in all parts of the United States;

"(2) evaluate the impact of such bilingual vocational training on the shortages of well-trained personnel, the unemployment or underemployment of persons with limited English-speaking ability, and the ability of such persons to contribute fully to the economy of the United States; and

"(3) report their findings annually to the President and the Congress.

"(b) The Commissioner shall consult with the Secretary of Labor with respect to the administration of this part. Regulations and guidelines promulgated by the Commissioner to carry out this part shall be consistent with those promulgated by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to section 301(b) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 and shall be approved by the Secretary of Labor before issuance.

"AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS

"Sec. 193. There are authorized to be appropriated $17,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, to carry out the provisions of this part.

"AUTHORIZATIONS OF GRANTS

"Sec. 194. (a) From the sums made available for grants under this part pursuant to section 193, the Commissioner is authorized to make grants to and enter into contracts with appropriate State agencies, local educational agencies, postsecondary educational institutions, private nonprofit vocational training institutions, and to other nonprofit organizations especially created to serve a group whose language as normally used is other than English in supplying training in recognized occupations and new and emerging occupations, and to enter into contracts with private for-profit agencies and organizations, to assist them in conducting bilingual vocational training programs for persons of all ages in all communities of the United States which are designed to insure that vocational training programs are available to all individuals who desire and need such bilingual vocational training.

"(b) The Secretary shall pay to each applicant which has an application approved under this part an amount equal to the total sums expended by the applicant for the purposes set forth in that application.

"USE OF FEDERAL FUNDS

"Sec. 195. Grants and contracts under this part may be used, in accordance with applications approved under section 197, for—

"(1) bilingual vocational training programs for persons who have completed or left elementary or secondary school and who are available for training by a postsecondary educational institution;

"(2) bilingual vocational training programs for persons who have already entered the labor market and who desire or need training or retraining to achieve year-round employment, adjust to changing manpower needs, expand their range of skills, or advance in employment; and

"(3) training allowances for participants in bilingual vocational training programs subject to the same conditions and limitations as are set forth in section 111 of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973.

"APPLICATIONS

"Sec. 196. (a) A grant or contract for assistance under this part may be made only upon application to the Commissioner at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information as the Commissioner deems necessary. Each such application shall—

"(1) provide that the activities and services for which assistance under this part is sought will be administered by or under the supervision of the applicant;

"(2) set forth a program for carrying out the purposes described in section 195; and

"(3) set forth a program of such size, scope, and design as will make a substantial contribution toward carrying out the purposes of this part.

"(b) No grant or contract may be made under this part directly to a local educational agency or a postsecondary educational institution or a private vocational training institution or any other eligible agency or organization unless that agency, institution, or organization has submitted the application to the State board established under part B of this title, or in the case of a State that does not have such a board, the similar State agency, for comment and includes the comment of that board or agency with the application.

"APPLICATION APPROVAL BY THE COMMISSIONER

"Sec. 197. (a) The Commissioner may approve an application for assistance under this part only if—

"(1) the application meets the requirements set forth in subsection (a) of the previous section;

"(2) in the case of an application submitted for assistance under this part to an agency, institution, or organization other than the State board established under part B of this title, the requirement of subsection (b) of the previous section is met; and

"(3) in the case of an application submitted for assistance under this part, the Commissioner determines that the program is consistent with criteria established by him, where feasible, after consultation with the State board established under part B of this title, for achieving equitable distribution of assistance under this part within that State.

"(b) An amendment to an application shall, except as the Secretary may otherwise provide, be subject to approval in the same manner as the original application."

"(c) Clause (4) of section 6(b) of the Library Services and Construction Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and to programs and projects which serve areas with high concentrations of persons of limited English-speaking ability (as defined in section 703(a) of title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, as amended)".

"(c) The amendments made by this section shall be effective on and after July 1, 1974.

PROVISIONS OF STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 69, EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1974, AFFECTING BILINGUAL EDUCATION

BILINGUAL EDUCATION ACT

Policy.—The Senate amendment, in amending the Bilingual Education Act, substitutes a new text for the existing text of such Act. The statement of policy of the Senate amendment recognizes the importance of bilingual educational methods and techniques, and declares the policy of the United States to be, in order to establish equal educational opportunity for all children, to encourage and assist such methods and techniques, from preschool through secondary school level.

The House bill contains no comparable provision. The House recedes, with an amendment clarifying that it is children of limited English-speaking ability who benefit through the fullest utilization of multiple language and cultural resources.

Extension of the Act; reservation of funds.—The House bill authorizes appropriations for the Bilingual Education Act of $135,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1974 through 1977. The Senate amendment authorizes $135,000,000 for fiscal year 1974, $145,000,000 for fiscal year 1975, $155,000,000 for fiscal year 1976, and $175,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1977 and 1978. For all such years, the Senate amendment authorizes such additional sums as Congress may determine.

The conference substitute authorizes $135,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1974 and 1975, $140,000,000 for fiscal year 1976, $150,000,000 for fiscal year 1977, and $160,000,000 for fiscal year 1978, with no additional amounts authorized for such years.

The Senate amendment also provides for the reservation of specific amounts of appropriated funds for training activities: 50% of the appropriation which is in excess of $35 million but not in excess of $60 million and 33 1/3% of the appropriation which is in excess of $60 million. Ten percent of the funds are also reserved for the National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education and the development of leadership capabilities in State educational institutions. The House recedes, with an amendment which sets aside for training purposes $16,000,000 from the first $70,000,000 appropriated and 33 1/3% of amounts appropriated in excess of that figure. One percent of the appropriation is reserved for the Advisory Council. For State coordination of technical assistance, $6.75 million is authorized for fiscal year 1974, $7.25 million for fiscal year 1975, $7.75 million for fiscal year 1976, $8.75 million for fiscal year 1977, and $9.75 million for fiscal year 1978.

Definitions.—The Senate amendment, but not the House bill or existing law, defines the terms "limited English-speaking ability", "native language", "low-income", "Bureau", "Director", and "Council" for purposes of the Bilingual Education Act. The House recedes, with an amendment which defines the term "native language" of an individual of limited English-speaking ability to mean the language normally used by such individuals or, in the case of a child, by the parents of the child. In adopting this definition, the conferees intend that normal usage of a language in a child's environment may also determine that child's native language.

The Senate amendment requires that a bilingual education program be a full-time program of instruction, designed for children of limited English-speaking ability in elementary and secondary school, in which there is instruction in both the native language of such children and in English, given with appreciation of the cultural heritage of such children, and in which, with respect to elementary schools, such instruction is to the maximum extent feasible to be in all courses which are required of the child pursuant to State law.

The House recedes to the Senate on the definition of a "bilingual education program" with an amendment to emphasize the conferees' concern that the new definition not be misinterpreted to indicate that an ultimate goal of the program is the establishment of a "bilingual society." However, the conferees agreed that the bilingual education program must include use of the native language of the child of limited English-speaking ability in the acquisition of skills and knowledge as well as—either through the development of literacy in, or the transfer of literacy from, his native language to literacy in English—in the acquisition of English language competence. The conferees acted to insure that the limited English-speaking child would progress effectively through the educational system. Thus, a limited English-speaking child should receive his instruction in whichever language is necessary to insure that he has the same opportunity to learn and develop his skills as a non-limited English-speaking child during the time that he is building his English competence to a level equivalent with his non-limited English-speaking peers. The con-feres also agreed in the amendment to maintain the requirement that all instruction be given with appreciation of the culture of the limited English-speaking student. This also was designed to encourage the appropriate study of the history and culture of the nation, territory, or geographical area with which the native language of the child of limited English-speaking ability is associated, and of the history and culture of the United States.

The Senate amendment also provides that a bilingual education program shall provide for the voluntary enrollment to a limited degree of children whose language is English, but priority must be given in participation to children whose language is other than English.

The conference substitute changes this provision from a requirement to a permitted activity of such a program, provides that the enrollment of English-speaking students need not be on a full-time basis, and provides that in no event shall such a program be designed for the purpose of teaching the foreign language to such students.

The Senate amendment also requires that a bilingual education program require that in courses of art, music and physical education, the program shall provide for the participation of children of limited English-speaking ability in regular classes; and provides that children enrolled in such a program be placed in classes with children of approximately the same age and level of educational attainment.

The House recedes.

The Senate amendment further requires that an application for a bilingual education program be developed in open consultation with parents of children of limited English-speaking ability, teachers and students, including public hearings and full participation of a committee composed of, and selected by, such parents, teachers and, in the case of secondary schools, students.

The conference substitute provides that an application shall be developed in consultation with parents of such children, teachers, and students in the areas to be served, and that the application shall give assurances that after the application has been approved, a committee will be established composed of and selected by parents, and secondary school students, where appropriate.

Regulations.—The Senate amendment provides that the Commissioner, after receiving recommendations from State and local educational agencies and groups involved in bilingual education, shall establish and publish suggested model guidelines containing recommendations for State and local educational agencies with respect to factors affecting the quality of instruction offered in bilingual education programs, such as student-teacher ratios and teacher qualifications. Neither the House bill nor existing law contains a comparable provision.

The conference substitute requires the Commissioner to distribute suggested models, with respect to such factors, but does not require State and local educational agencies to consult with the Commissioner about such models to achieve maximum voluntary conformity.

Financial assistance for bilingual education programs.—The Senate amendment but not the House bill expands the description in existing law of the uses to which funds available for grants under the Bilingual Education Act may be put in assisting bilingual education programs and adds new requirements for applications for such funds by local educational agencies.

The House bill contains no comparable provisions. The House recedes with an amendment combining all training program references in the language of the Senate amendment.

It is the intent of this legislation that the eligible children enrolled in non-public schools share equitably in the benefits of this program. This can be accomplished not only by charing in teacher training programs and by utilizing special materials and equipment but through the provision of specially trained public school personnel who would be necessary for the implementation of a quality bilingual education program.

State program of coordination of bilingual education programs.—The Senate amendment provides that if in any fiscal year the Commissioner determines for any State that (1) the State educational agency has developed high quality leadership capabilities for coordination of programs of bilingual education; (2) there is in effect for such State a statute under the State constitution or a decision of the highest court of the State or of the United States requiring equal educational opportunity for children of limited English-speaking ability of such State; (3) local educational agencies in such State operate bilingual education programs serving a substantial number of children of limited English-speaking ability; (4) the expenditures for such fiscal year from State revenues for bilingual education programs constitute not less than 15% in the first year for which a State receives payments for State coordination activities, 20% in the second year, and 25% in each succeeding year, of the entitled expenditures for bilingual education programs in the State; and (5) local educational agencies in the State will be paid under the Bilingual Education Act amounts at least equal to the amounts received in fiscal 1973, the Commissioner shall upon application from the State educational agency provide for the submission and approval of a program for the coordination by such State educational agency of, and the provision by such State agency of technical assistance to, bilingual education programs assisted under this Act. The Commissioner shall pay to each State educational agency, for each program approved, such sums which may be necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the State program. The amount paid shall not exceed an amount which, when added to the amount which the State receives for development of its leadership capabilities, equals 5% of the amounts paid to local educational agencies within the State for bilingual education. Such sums as may be necessary are authorized to be appropriated for State coordination and technical assistance activities.

There is no comparable provision in the House bill or existing law.

The conference agreement provides that, upon application from a State educational agency, the Commissioner shall provide for the submission and approval of a State program for the coordination by such agency of technical assistance to programs of bilingual education in the State. The State program shall contain assurances that Federal funds will supplement and not supplant State funds for bilingual education, including technical assistance from the State. The amount paid to a State agency shall not exceed 5 percent of the aggregate of payments to local educational agencies in the State in the preceding fiscal year.

The Senate amendment contains a new limitation on the amount of funds which can be used in schools with ungraded classes and in secondary schools.

The House bill contains no comparable provision. The Senate recedes.

The Senate amendment provides that the funds must be distributed equitably in all areas of the United States while giving priority to States within such areas having the greatest need for programs.

The House bill contains no comparable provision. The conference substitute adopts the provision of the Senate amendment, with an amendment that the Commissioner is directed to give priority to areas having the greatest need for programs assisted under the Act.

The Senate amendment contains a new authorization for the Commissioner to approve applications from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico for children who live in Puerto Rico, but are of limited Spanish-speaking ability.

The Senate recedes. In deleting this item, the conferees wish to emphasize that this is done without prejudice and with the knowledge that under the Bilingual Education Act programs are presently being conducted in Puerto Rico for children of limited Spanish-speaking ability. The conferees do not believe that this authority needs to be expressly stipulated in legislation.

Indian children in schools.—The Senate amendment changes the provisions of the Bilingual Education Act with respect to Indian children, so that certain reports on assistance to such children under such Act and on the needs of such children with respect to the purposes of such Act will be made to Congress and the President by the Secretary of the Interior.

The House bill contains no comparable provision. The House recedes.

Training.—The Senate amendment, but not the House bill or existing law, provides that the Commissioner shall, in carrying out his duties under the program of assistance for bilingual education programs, provide for policies and programs related to training of personnel in connection with such programs, including provision for 200-500 fellowships for study leading to an advanced degree for persons planning to pursue a career in bilingual education. The Commissioner may not award less than 200 such fellowships unless he certifies in the Federal Register and to the authorizing committees that applications from 200 qualified applicants were not submitted.

The conference substitute adopts this provision, with amendments so as to provide in fiscal year 1975 for not less than 100 fellowships in the field of training teachers in bilingual education. It is the conferees' expectation that recipients of such fellowships will remain in the field of training such vitally needed personnel. The Commissioner is directed, in awarding these fellowships among eligible applicants, to award them in proportion to the needs of the various groups of limited English-speaking ability in the country.

Bureau of Bilingual Education.—The Senate amendment establishes in the Office of Education a Bureau of Bilingual Education headed by a GS-18 Director to whom the Commissioner must delegate all of his delegable functions relating to bilingual education.

Neither the House bill nor existing law contain a comparable provision.

The conference substitute establishes an Office of Bilingual Education in the Office of Education, without the creation of super-grade positions.

Annual report on the condition of bilingual education.—The Senate amendment provides for an annual report on the condition of bilingual education submitted by the Director through the Commissioner and the operation of the Bilingual Education Act, including an assessment of needs, a survey of the number of persons of limited English-speaking ability, and a plan for extension of programs of bilingual education and bilingual vocational and adult education programs, a detailed estimate of necessary expenditures by Federal, State, local, and private sources, an assessment of the educational personnel necessary, and a description of personnel in regional offices dealing with bilingual education. If reports are delayed beyond their due date by the Office of Management and Budget, the Director shall immediately submit them to Congress in the form they were submitted to the Office of Management and Budget. The Senate bill also provides for a survey, to be completed by July 1, 1976, of all children and persons of limited English-speaking ability in the United States. The study shall be conducted by the National Center for Education Statistics.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute provides that this report will be made by the Commissioner, and that it will include cost estimates. The conference substitute requires that such report is due twice: November 1, 1975, and November 1, 1977. The provision relating to delays in submission of the reports is omitted from the conference substitute, but the conferees expect that such reports will be submitted when statutorily required.

National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education.—The Senate amendment revises existing law to specify the membership of the National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education.

The House bill continues the provisions of existing law. The House recedes.

Grants for bilingual education.—The House bill adds to section 704 of the Bilingual Education Act a provision whereby if a local educational agency determines, in accordance with criteria provided by the Commissioner of Education, that the needs of schools having high concentrations of students of limited English-speaking ability from families with incomes below $3,000 per year have been adequately met, it may carry out programs under that title in other schools where, in accordance with criteria of the Commissioner, there is a major need for bilingual education programs.

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision. The House recedes.

The House bill also amends section 705(a) of such Act to provide that grants may be made to an institution of higher education, including a junior or community college, applying jointly with one or more local educational agencies.

The Senate amendment provides in its new section 723 that training grants may be made to such institutions which apply after consultation with, or jointly with, local educational agencies.

The Senate recedes, with an amendment which provides that training grants may be made to such institutions without joint application with local educational agencies.

Supportive services and activities for bilingual education.—The Senate amendment provides that certain supportive services and activities in connection with bilingual education shall be administered by the Assistant Secretary, in consultation with the Commissioner (through the Bureau of Bilingual Education) and with the Director of the National Institute of Education. Such services and activities include a program of research in the field of bilingual education, operation of a national clearinghouse of information, and a program for the development in State education agencies of leadership capabilities in such field; $5 million is authorized to be appropriated to the National Institute of Education for bilingual research and demonstration projects. If such appropriations do not reach $5 million, 5 percent of the National Institute of Education's appropriation, but no less than $3 million, is earmarked.

The House bill contains no comparable provisions, except that the House bill does provide the Commissioner with authority under the Bilingual Education Act to make grants for research or demonstration projects materials for use in bilingual education projects designed to disseminate instructional materials for use in bilingual education programs, and for projects designed to provide preservice or inservice training for bilingual education personnel.

The conference substitute adopts the provisions of the Senate amendment, but requires that contracts thereunder be competitive, and deletes those provisions of the Senate amendment requiring models of bilingual education programs and model State statutes. Such requirements are considered to be unnecessary in view of section 703(b) of the Bilingual Education Act, as contained in the conference substitute, which requires the Commissioner to establish, publish, and disseminate models with respect to bilingual education programs. The conferees intend that such section 703(b) includes development of models (including model bilingual and bicultural curricula) for bilingual education programs and for other activities for which funds may be used under subsection (a) of section 721 of the Bilingual Education Act, and model State statute or statutes designed to promote equal educational opportunity for children of limited English-speaking ability through bilingual education practices, techniques, and methods.

The conference substitute retains the clearinghouse function but drops the language of the Senate amendment which designated the clearinghouse as a "Center for Bilingual Education," eliminates the program for the development of leadership capabilities in State educational agencies, and eliminates the earmarking of the National Institute of Education funds for these supportive services and activities. In deleting the earmarking for NIE, the conferees wish to indicate that their opposition is to the precedent that such earmarking would establish for NIE, rather than opposition to the expenditure of funds for bilingual education research by the Institute.

Developing institutions.—The Senate amendment, but not the House bill, amends title III of such Act (Developing Institutions) by authorizing the Commissioner to waive three years of the requirement that institutions be in existence for five years prior to their eligibility for assistance under title III if the particular institution is located in or near communities with large numbers of Spanish-speaking people and if the Commissioner determines that such waiver will increase higher education opportunities for Spanish-speaking people.

The conference substitute adopts this provision of the Senate amendment, omitting the necessity for the particular institution to be located in or near communities with large numbers of Spanish-speaking people, and requiring that the Commissioner determine that waiver will substantially increase such opportunities. The conference agreement is not meant to exclude for consideration of a waiver those institutions already serving large numbers of Spanish-speaking people.

Bilingual education.—The Senate amendment, but not the House bill, amends subpart 4 (special services for disadvantaged students) of part A of title IV of such Act—

(a) to authorize support for remedial and other special services for students with academic potential who by reason of limited English-speaking ability are in need of bilingual educational teaching, guidance and counseling in order to enable them to pursue postsecondary education; and

(b) to authorize the use of funds appropriated for the Special Services Program for the training of persons to provide bilingual educational teaching, guidance and counseling needed in order to enable limited English-speaking ability students to pursue a postsecondary education.

The House recedes as to the first such amendment. The conference substitute provides that recipients of grants for such special services shall include in their curriculum a program of English language instruction for students of limited English-speaking ability. Programs to train persons to provide bilingual instruction and counseling can be supported under the Education Professions Development Act.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Amendments to the Library Services and Construction Act and the Vocational Education Act of 1963 relating to bilingual education and vocational training.—The Senate amendment, but not the House bill, revises the Vocational Education Act of 1963 in the following manner:

The Senate amendment authorizes $40 million each for fiscal years 1975 and 1976 for the purpose of funding a new bilingual vocational education program. The conference substitute authorizes $17,500,000 for fiscal year 1975 only.

The Senate amendment includes persons of limited English-speaking ability on the national and State vocational education advisory councils.

The conference substitute includes this provision, but the State advisory council may include such students where appropriate.

The Senate amendment includes a new definition of "vocational training" and a new definition of "postsecondary educational institution."

The conference substitute adopts this provision, but requires that a postsecondary educational institution must be nonprofit.

The Senate amendment requires that 5 percent of the appropriations for basic State grants under the Act be distributed by the Commissioner to States which he finds have areas of high concentrations of persons of limited English-speaking ability.

The conference substitute does not retain this provision of the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment requires that the new $40 million authorization be distributed within States among school districts serving areas with concentrations of children with limited English-speaking ability. The Senate recedes.

The Senate amendment creates a new program for bilingual vocational training administered by the Commissioner, in consultation with the Secretary of Labor, with authorizations of $40 million for fiscal year 1975, $60 million for fiscal year 1976, and $80 million for fiscal year 1977. Sixty-five percent of funding is allotted for grants and contracts to State and local educational agencies, postsecondary and private vocational training institutions, and other non-profit agencies to provide bilingual vocational training. One quarter of the funds are reserved for the training of teachers and ancillary personnel, such as counselors, and 10 percent will be devoted to the development of instructional materials and methods.

The conference substitute authorizes $17,500,000 for fiscal year 1975 only, for bilingual vocational training programs. The provisions of the Senate amendment relating to instructor training programs and development of instructional materials, methods, and techniques are not included in the conference substitute.

The Senate amendment, but not the House bill, inserts in the Library Services and Construction Act a new requirement that priority in funding under that Act must be given to areas with high concentrations of persons with limited English-speaking ability. The House recedes.

ADJUSTMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE ON TOBACCO

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, there is at the desk a message from the House in the form of H.R. 17635—a bill to adjust the support price for tobacco. It is a reasonable bill—guided through the House by two Kentucky Congressmen, Mr. STUBBLEFIELD and Mr. PERKINS.

December 19, 1974

Two days of hearings before my subcommittee on agricultural marketing, production, and stabilization of prices clearly demonstrates the need for this legislation. The present formula for determining the tobacco support price has proved to be inadequate in responding to the substantial increases in production costs over the past years and consequently has failed to provide growers with the protection intended by the program.

H.R. 17635 would set the support price at 75 percent of parity. This would result in a modest increase—still substantially below the current and projected market price. So it is not expected that the new support price could result in the Government acquiring any appreciable amount of tobacco. But it would provide the grower—who is typically a small farmer greatly dependent on tobacco income to sustain his operation—with a reasonable amount of insurance that his investment and labor will not result in great financial loss. It will also strengthen his position in negotiating bank loans necessary to finance his total farming activity.

As for the amount of tobacco the Government might acquire under the support program, it should be pointed out that during the past several years, such stocks have been disposed of at a profit and at present there is practically no tobacco in the Government pool.

I believe H.R. 17635 should be passed. But I realize that during these final hours of the 93d Congress action could only be accomplished through a unanimous consent agreement. Several Senators have indicated their intention to object to any such agreement.

I regret that this is the case because there is every indication that a majority of this body would agree to this measure if a vote could be taken. But I believe that by the favorable House action and the hearings that have been held, we have laid the groundwork and provided the factual basis for affirmative action on the matter in the next Congress.

That will be our objective, and Mr. President, I am confident that a majority of the Members see the wisdom and correctness of our objective and will respond accordingly.

TAKEOVER OF SIKKIM BY INDIA

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, from random headlines in the world's press over the last months, there has been unfolding the cynical story of India's progressive engulfment of its tiny, but strategic, Himalayan neighbor, Sikkim.

Let me cite a few of the captions of these press reports: "India's House backs Sikkim 'Association';" "India humbles Sikkim ruler;" "India presses Nepal to drop Sikkim aid;" "India saved Sikkim democracy;" "Chogyal: I tried to save Sikkim identity;" "India snubs China over Sikkim status;" "The heavy hand of Mother India: There is growing talk of guerrilla action in Sikkim;" "Government in Sikkim asks ouster of titular ruler."

What happens to a remote Himalayan kingdom may seem irrelevant to Mr. American Citizen today, harried by inflation, crime in the streets, public scandals; yet as champions of the right of self-determination for all peoples regardless of size or significance, Americans should be aware of situations where this right is being violated. That, I regret to say, is the case of Sikkim versus Mother India, whose maternal attention the Sikkimese people regard less as affectionate than acquisitive. For the record, let me put the story together behind the jumble of headlines as I know it and have reason to believe it true.

Although quick to criticize others for alleged imperialist designs, India has chosen to ignore the Indian-Sikkimese Treaty of 1950, signed by two sovereign states, and now contends Sikkim has always been a "princely" state and part of India.

Having obtained the right to station troops in Sikkim as part of a common defense plan against China, the Indian Government took advantage of mysteriously incited disorders in Sikkim in the spring of 1973 to send and maintain there a force of 400 central reserve police, CRP, for influencing the internal situation and turning it to the advantage of Indian ambitions. The CRP, according to reports, controls all communications and, in some cases, movement of Sikkimese from one part of the country to another. At the same time, the Indian Government has made it almost impossible for foreign journalists and observers to enter Sikkim to see what is going on there.

With the country firmly under Indian domination, it is not surprising that from an admittedly confused ethnic and political situation, there emerged in June 1974 a new constitutional structure in Sikkim, in which the chief executive, an Indian, wields governing authority in the place of the monarch, or chogyal, while an allegedly popularly elected assembly dutifully legislates in response to executive directives.

It is this assembly that petitioned the Indian Government in the summer for the "association" of Sikkim with India, a request which the Indian Parliament contentedly granted in September.

It is the same assembly which is now advocating the removal of the chogyal in what India describes as a confrontation between the titular ruler and the Sikkimese people. In reality, it is a confrontation between the Sikkimese people and a foreign imposed regime. Western Europeans should be sympathetic to the Sikkimese plight, having experienced such "governments" under their own history.

I am aware that the Indian people are beset by staggering difficulties and problems and that they have adhered to the parliamentary system and an open society. I only wish they would practice what they preach in their relations with their neighbors and, in particular, refrain from further interference in the right of the Sikkimese people to self-determination.

In this connection, let me quote Prime Minister Nehru who in August 1959 stated that he "cannot imagine any foreign authority doing anything which is in infringement of the sovereignty of Sikkim and Bhutan."

IMPORTANCE OF CAPE VERDEAN ELECTIONS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations is the smallest State in the Union, but it is an impressive State. It tightly packs a lot of diversity and quality. Contributing to this characteristic is the State's large ethnic group of Americans of Portuguese origin, many of whose forebears came from the Azores and the Cape Verde Islands, some even back in the days of Moby Dick. Rhode Island shares this good fortune with Massachusetts.

Recently, I met with a group of Rhode Islanders with Cape Verde ties, who are concerned that the Cape Verdeans will be denied the right of real self-determination now that the future status of the islands is up for consideration following the change of government in Portugal.

Their fear arises from reports that Communist and extremist elements of the PAIG, the party in Guinea-Bissau that led the independence movement for Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands, are doing everything in their power, including the use of terror tactics, to prevent the Cape Verdeans from making a free choice in deciding their future. The extremists are working for the automatic absorption of the islands with Guinea-Bissau on the African mainland. Americans with Cape Verdean connections are urging that Portugal and the island authorities take all measures to assure the population a free choice as to their future status, especially in view of a significant sentiment for some continuing tie with Portugal.

I am informed that the Portuguese Government is in the process of setting up an interim regime for the islands, consisting of a High Commissioner appointed by Portugal and four ministers, two named by Portugal and two by the PAIG. The regime will be charged with arranging elections to be held sometime between April and June in which the Cape Verdeans will choose members of a constituent assembly. The assembly, in turn, will decide upon the various options for determining the islands' future.

If this plan is honestly executed, it should provide for the exercise of self-determination that the Cape Verdeans seek. I earnestly hope that all of the parties concerned will faithfully work to realize this objective. I can well understand why Cape Verde Americans wish for their Island cousins the same benefits of the democratic process as we enjoy in the United States.

To become better acquainted with this unique and accomplished group of fellow citizens, I ask unanimous consent that an article in the January issue of the National Geographic entitled "New England's 'Little Portugal,'" be printed in the Record. From it, Senators will learn how these people contribute to the enrichment of our national life by a lively consciousness of their origins combined with the achievements of their daily lives as dedicated Americans.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NEW ENGLAND'S "LITTLE PORTUGAL"

(By O. Louis Mazzatenta)

It is no small feat to retain grace and dignity while edging through a crowd with a heavy suitcase. But somehow Catarina Alves was managing it on that golden afternoon at Boston's Logan International Airport. Using sign language, I offered to carry her luggage to an immigration booth. She smiled a silent thank-you.

A tall woman with salt-and-pepper hair and the brown skin of a Cape Verdean, Catarina is one of more than 100,000 Portuguese who have immigrated to the United States in the past decade.

Others had arrived even earlier, of course. Many Portuguese-Americans firmly believe that a Portuguese explorer—Miguel Corte Real—and his crew lived among the Indians a century before the English landed at Plymouth.

Over the years an increasing flow of Portuguese came to settle—mostly in New England. A quota system adopted in 1924 restricted the flow, but a law passed in 1965 opened the gates again. With limited land and opportunities at home, Portuguese have been arriving since then in greater numbers than ever. Thousands still head for New England—including Catarina Alves. Her immigration form indicated that she would stay at first with friends in Pawtucket, Rhode Island.

The next day, with Professor T. Steven Tegu—friend, translator, and teacher of modern languages at Rhode Island College—I called on Catarina at her temporary new home.

An attractive woman who answered our knock listened cautiously as the professor explained in Portuguese our interest in Catarina. In effect, we quite presumptuously invited ourselves to join the immigrant Catarina for her first breakfast in America. The woman nodded, won over by Dr. Tegu's good humor. "Yes," she said, "she arrived last night. When I came home late from work at the factory, I found her in my bed."

Soon we were engulfed by Catarina's friends and relatives. Her daughter, Eugenia, appeared, along with Eugenia's husband and four children. They had preceded Catarina to America by three weeks.

It was a bustling, cheerful breakfast, though communication was difficult. Catarina spoke only crioulo, an Afro-Portuguese dialect, so her conversation had to be translated into Portuguese, and then into English.

She had lived on Brava, one of Portugal's Cape Verde Islands. It was a 48-day trip from there to Pawtucket. First an island-hopping boat. Then a plane to Lisbon. Then a long wait while documents were sought and slowly processed—and finally that flight to Boston's airport.

Was the long trip worth it? Catarina looked lovingly at her family. "Está contente," her son-in-law said. Yet, it was worth it.

As we prepared to leave, I gave each of the children a dollar—an old Italian custom I had learned from my father. Eugenia's youngest daughter, Ester, clutched the bill in one hand and a toy in the other.

"Quero dar ao Senhor a minha boneca," the 2-year-old said. "I want to give you my doll."

IMMIGRANTS TRANSPLANT ISLAND PAGEANTRY
Such open warmth greeted me again in Fall River, Massachusetts, the heart of New England's Portuguese communities. I went there on a sun-kissed Sunday to attend the Feast of Santo Criscao, a duplicate of one held yearly on the island of Sao Miguel in the Azores, Portugal's mid-Atlantic archipelago.

Surely someone in Fall River must speak English! I felt like an immigrant myself, unable to communicate with the happy throngs around me. And then a smile wove its way toward me, attached to Raul Benevides.

"Bom dia," he said. "You want to take pictures? I'll clear the way. You can use the porches, the roofs, the balconies—anywhere. I get you there."

His smile was like a flashbulb going off. Teeth gleamed, wavy hair glistened, nose puckered, and a precisely trimmed moustache stretched across his lip. He used that smile often as he towed me through the crowd.

Suddenly a shattering explosion of bells came from the church, where a procession was forming. Out of the darkness emerged a striking statue of Christ, borne on the shoulders of six somber men in formal dress. A shaft of sunlight fell on the statue's scarlet cape, embroidered with gold thread by women parishioners.

Raul led me up three flights of stairs in a building near the church. "My sister lives here," he said.

We entered an apartment filled with children in Sunday finery, and with the fragrance of a feast. Once again, Portuguese hospitality overwhelmed me. The senhor must sample the food, I was told firmly. They stuffed me with marinated roast beef, a spicy sausage called chouriço, sweetbreads, and javaz—large beans baked in the Portuguese style.

Through lace curtains Raul and I watched the procession passing below. Dark-suited men genuflected at the curb as the priest strode by carrying the monstrance containing the Host. It was a scene brought straight from the Azores.

SUCCESS IN AMERICA HAS ITS PRICE

What prompts a man to tear up roots and begin again in a new country?

"Back in São Miguel," Raul answered thoughtfully, "I worked for the government, and earned about $1,500 a year. But things were so expensive, it was very difficult."

And so seven years ago Raul brought his wife and two children to the U.S. For six years he painted houses. Now he sells automobiles and conducts a weekly radio show.

"The show is all in Portuguese. I call it 'Acores-Madeira.' I rent the station, and sell ads for the program. I'm independent."

But Raul's transition from blue to white collar has exacted a price. "My stomach gets upset now, and I don't sleep so good," he said. "You know, that never happened before."

Relationships between Fall River's Portuguese and the city's other ethnic groups are seldom upsetting—but one lively incident occurred some years ago on the 800th anniversary of Portugal's birth.

An impressive statue of Portugal's famous Prince Henry the Navigator had been commissioned for the occasion. Who would object to such a worthy project?

"Unfortunately," news editor Herman Mello of the Fall River Herald News told me, "the statue was erected at the intersection of Eastern Avenue and Pleasant Street—which happens to be in the heart of the city's French-Canadian community! The French got a bit excited and there was talk of tearing the statue down."

Herman chuckled. "But word got around to the French that some Portuguese with a tow truck were ready to pull down their statue of Lafayette. So it was a standoff. There was a lot of tension, but it quieted down finally. Both statues are still standing, and we're all friends now."

There remains some rivalry among the Portuguese themselves, even though most of the immigrants—mainlander, Azorean, Madiran, and Cape Verdean—share a common fishing and agrarian background.

Cape Verdeans are perhaps the most distinctive group, a racially mixed people whose African heritage has blended with the Portuguese. They were among the last who came to man New Bedford's whalers in the past century, and later to pick Cape Cod cranberries.

Theirs has been an isolated existence at times. Older Cape Verdean immigrants tend to claim Portuguese identity, but younger ones often seek ties with New England's black communities. Mutual acceptance among the parties—white Portuguese, Cape Verdeans, and blacks—has not always been the result. The coincidence of dark skin and deep Roman Catholic faith places many Cape Verdeans apart from both of the other groups. Nonetheless, the dignity and character among the Cape Verdeans I encountered were impressive. I still recall Tony Andrews, a farmer and leading citizen of Falmouth, Massachusetts. (An immigration officer "simplified" his name from de Andrade when Tony arrived in this country 45 years ago.)

I found him riding a tractor in the middle of a cornfield one day and handed him my business card by way of introduction. A handsome man, Tony pushed back his hat, and clapped the dust from his hands. He reached into his work pants and handed me a beautifully embossed card of his own. "Commonwealth of Massachusetts," it read. "Member, Board of Agriculture."

FACTORIES AND PROMISING NEWCOMERS

Some older immigrants have worked their way into independent enterprises, but new arrivals usually begin in the lower-paying jewelry, shoe, clothing, and textile industries.

Fall River's textile plants are granite-walled fortresses with an eternal look. But the Great Depression, the southward movement of industry, and foreign competition have conquered many of the mills. A few still hum with life, though. In the Providence File Fabric Corporation's plant, Fall River's largest, nearly half the 1,200 employees are Portuguese. Company manuals, newsletters, and safety signs are printed in both English and Portuguese. Employees with supervisory potential may be sent to English classes.

But there are not enough jobs to go around. "There's about 10 percent unemployment here," City Councilor John Medeiros told me. "Some of the settled Portuguese resent the newcomers. They're afraid the immigrants will take their jobs."

I talked to one of the 10 percent: Tony Medeiros. Yes, the newcomers, or "greenhorns," are helping to cause the unemployment situation, he told me. But a few weeks later I saw Tony again, at Fall River's airport, and he was more cheerful. He had a job as a painter on the big Braga Bridge (named after a Portuguese-American) that spans the Taunton River at the city's edge.

"I was just kidding about greenhorns the other day," he said with a grin. "A bunch of them were standing right beside us, you know. Half my relatives are greenhorns!"

I asked Tony what had brought him to the airport, and in his answer sensed something of the adventurous spirit that launched so many Portuguese explorers into the unknown.

"Painting that high bridge got me interested in parachute jumping," he said. "This Saturday I jump for the first time. But I thought it would be good to go up in a plane today. I've never been in one before."

FATE DOMINATES PORTUGUESE SONG

One evening I drove down a lonesome country road a few miles north of New Bedford. Through the open door of an old farmhouse I walked into a bit of Portugal—the Fado Restaurant.

A dark-haired woman named Valentina stood in the center of the room, eyes closed, hands clasped passionately. She seemed possessed by an inner struggle. A guitarist struck a chord. The tension snapped, and she began singing from her soul.

It was my introduction to fado—the Portuguese equivalent of our American blues. Fado means "fate." Usually it is a melancholy one, involving unrequited love, and it can loosen tears from almost any listener's eyes.

As she sang, I dined on carne de porco à alentejana—pork with clams—on endless side dishes, on sweet pudim flen, and washed it all down with vinho branco. Portuguese food is as flavorful as Portuguese song.

Next day I approached another side of Portuguese life in New Bedford's famed whaling museum. George Avila, one of the curators, and an expert on things Portuguese, showed me the ship's article on the whaler Acushnet, which sailed out of Fairhaven, across the river, more than a century ago.

Acushnet? Herman Melville partially modeled the fictional Pequod after her in his book Moby Dick. And sure enough, his signature was scrawled among the others when the real vessel sailed in 1841.

"Here," said Avila, "are some of the Portuguese in her crew: George W. Galvan and Joseph Luis, both from Fayal, in the Azores. And John Adams, a Cape Verdean. His name was probably Adão, Anglicized by the captain."

"PARDELAS" POINT THE WAY TO FISH

The museum rekindled a boyhood notion of going to sea, so I arranged to sail with Armando Estrella aboard his fishing trawler, Venture I.

From the Fairhaven dock we headed for the fishing grounds. "Very dangerous," Armando said as we entered a channel past Woods Hole on the southwest tip of Cape Cod. "Strong tides. Very skinny channel. Many boats go down here." We made it through without incident, though.

Soon a spicy aroma drifted up from the galley. Rabbit stew. Delicious.

A heavy rumbling awoke me early the next morning. We were fifteen miles off the Cape and the crew was paying out the net. Armando leaned from the pilothouse window as he steered a half circle to let the net deploy. I went on deck to help, but the mate shook his head. I was a guest.

Three times that morning the net went down and was brought aboard again to spew its cargo of fish, mud, sand, and shells onto the deck. The men worked with precision, separating good fish—mostly gray sole, flounder, haddock, and cod—from unmarketable ones. Hungry gulls screamed overhead.

"We call those sea gulls gaviotas," Armando told me. "But we look for another bird, pardela—you call it shearwater. Important bird. When the pardelas fly down, they go for sardines. When they do that, we put our nets down for the good fish that feed on sardines. One hundred percent they are there."

Fog rolled in that night, but the fishing continued. I asked about the hazard of other ships suddenly looming out of the night.

"We have radar for that," Armando said. He turned on the set hidden behind the cabin wall and peered at the illuminated screen for a moment. "Nothing," he said casually and flicked the set off to return to his work. Somehow, my landlubber's fears were not allayed by that fleeting radar image.

A few days later I transferred at sea by dinghy to another Portuguese fishing boat heading for Provincetown, Massachusetts. Armando continued on to the Georges Bank, where the fishing would be better.

WERE PORTUGUESE THE FIRST COLONISTS?

From the city of Provincetown, near Cape Cod's tip, a tower rises. "That commemorates the Pilgrims' first landing in 1620," I was told by a Portuguese-American sailor. "When those Pilgrims arrived, we had the harbor all buoyed out for them."

The subject of who the first "pilgrims" were is no laughing matter in New England. Adherents of the theory that they were Portuguese point, as proof, to a 40-ton sandstone boulder on the bank of the Taunton River, 30 miles upstream from Narragansett Bay.

Dighton Rock, it is called, and it is covered by a mosaic of mysterious carvings (page 98). Among them appear what some regard as clues that the Portuguese, indeed, came first. In 1920 Dr. Edmund Burke Delabarre, psychology professor at Providence's Brown University, spotted an inscription he believed to be the date 1511. He had already published several articles about the rock, but suddenly he had a specific year on which to concentrate.

He found from royal charters in Lisbon that two brothers sailed from there to North America on separate voyages. Gaspar Corte Real embarked in 1501. His brother Miguel left, probably the next year, in search of the missing Gaspar. Neither ever returned.

I visited the rock with Dr. Manuel Luciano da Silva, a doctor of internal medicine and a dedicated student of Portuguese history. Dr. da Silva showed me a cross carved on the boulder. "There are more than 300 variations of crosses," he said, "but this is the Portuguese style, with the 45° angle at the base."

Then he showed me the 1511 date that the late Dr. Delabarre had found. "Note that the five is shaped like an 'S'. That's the way a Portuguese would have written it."

With his father he traced another carving: an "M" and "COR" beneath it. "To me, that stands for Miguel Corte Real. He could have arrived here in mid-1502, and stayed for at least nine years."

"Surely in those nine years there would be intermingling of Portuguese and Indian blood," he paused, building up to his point.

"When later Europeans—Verrazano and Roger Williams—arrived here, they noted the Indians were light in color. They called themselves Wampanoag, 'People of the Dawn Light.' I believe their paler hue was a characteristic passed on by Miguel's crew."

Dr. da Silva waved at Grassy Island in midriver. "An Indian burial ground has been found out there. I wish excavations would begin on this shore, so we could fit more pieces of the puzzle together."

"After all," he said firmly, "this is an American monument, not a Portuguese one."

FAMILY THRIVES ON TOGETHERNESS

The bond that sent Miguel Corte Real across an unknown ocean in search of his brother is the same one that links the Portuguese today. Family loyalty.

I talked with affable Joseph Fernandes, who arrived in this country in 1924 at the age of 13 months, later graduated from Boston University, and now heads a chain of 32 Massachusetts supermarkets. His management team is made up of brothers-in-law, nephews, nieces, and other relatives. They work together in a modern campuslike headquarters in Norton, 19 miles north of Fall River. They live together in a compound of handsome houses tucked away in a grove of pine trees.

"The lines of authority have to be clearly understood in a family situation like this," Mr. Fernandes told me. "The others have a right to question my reasoning when I am reaching a decision, and we can all argue about it, too. But once I make the decision..."

A nephew finished his sentence: "... it becomes law!"

An emigrant can take comfort from the knowledge that relatives will be waiting when he arrives—and that many schools in Portuguese New England offer classes to help him understand his adopted country.

With my language-professor friend, Dr. T. Steven Tegu, I visited one of those classes. When we reached the classroom door, the students were reading in English, droning the phrases in a dry flat monotone.

Dr. Tegu winced. The regular class instructor grinned and waved the professor in.

"When you speak a country's language," my friend announced, "you must adopt the manners of that country. If you are a lover, you must live the part of a lover."

He raised his arms. "Now, say after me, 'I love you, te quero—but with feeling!' Dr. Tegu's soulful "I love you" nearly steamed the classroom windows.

The students roared back in unison, "I 1-o-o-o-ve you," and dissolved into laughter. "Now say, 'I kiss you, beijo-te,'" Dr. Tegu bellowed, lunging with outstretched arms toward a stout woman. Her startled shriek was drowned out by another howl of laughter.

As Dr. Tegu and I left, the students were reading aloud again. Rarely have English words been uttered with such drama.

CEREMONY SEALS A LIFETIME VOW

"Graduation" for these students takes place in a Providence, Rhode Island, courtroom. On a day when new citizens were being sworn in, I took a seat amid an overflow crowd of friends and relatives. Raymond J. Pettine, Chief Judge of the U.S. District Court, presided. He spoke with earnest eloquence.

"My father came here as a poor Italian immigrant some eighty years ago. I think of the day he took his oath of allegiance as you will today. How could he have dreamed that someday his son would be sitting on this bench—perhaps the very court where he swore his own allegiance to the United States."

Every eye was fixed on the black-robed judge as he continued: "Keep alive the heritage and culture of your homeland. When people like you become citizens, America is enriched. I ask you to hold your citizenship dear—to hold it sacred. Love your country."

They stood then, those Portuguese, and all the others who had come to this nation in hope of a better life. They repeated, as if with one voice:

"I pledge allegiance..."

AMERICAN ELECTRIC POWER—ADS AND SALES EXPENSES DWARF R. & D.

Mr. METCALF, Mr. President, for the last several years, I have inserted into the RECORD figures released by the Federal Power Commission comparing advertising and sales and research and development expenditures of all major investor-owned electric utilities. The figures for 1973 have just been released, and for the first time they are at least encouraging. In 1973, investor-owned electric utilities spent 1.1 times as much on advertising and sales as they did on research and development. In 1971, the ratio was 3.3 to 1, and in 1969 and 1970 the ratio was 7 to 1. As a whole, the electric utility seems to be headed in the right direction.

It is important to keep in mind, however, that through accounting procedures, research, and development figures can be padded, while advertising expenses can be made to appear smaller than they actually are.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the figures for 1973—as published by the Federal Power Commission—be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the figures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1 Reflects adjustment of prior years expenditures.

2 New Jersey Power & Light Co. merged into Jersey Central Power & Light Co. July 31, 1973.

In preparation for the merger the two companies entered into an operating agreement which became effective July 1, 1972, and filed a combined annual report for the year 1972.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, one group of companies stands out in opposition to the tide of increased research and development expenditures. The American Electric Power system—AEP—the largest electric utility holding company in the Nation, actually decreased the percentage of its total operating revenues spent on R. & D. by 0.13 percent in 1973. Meanwhile, the electric utility industry as a whole increased the percentage of its total operating revenues spent on R. & D. by 0.13 percent during that same period.

While that set of figures alone is distressing, I am even more amazed when I look at the record of AEP over the last 4 years. Six of its seven wholly owned subsidiaries spent less money in 1973 on research and development than they spent in 1970.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a chart showing American Electric Power's research and development expenditures for the last 4 years be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMERICAN ELECTRIC POWER SYSTEM—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT EXPENSES OF SUBSIDIARIES, 1970-73

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, the figures comparing American Electric Power's research and development expenditures with its advertising and sales expenditures in 1973 are equally distressing. As I stated earlier, the entire industry spent 1.1 times as much on advertising and sales as on research and development last year. During that same period, AEP's companies averaged 6.8 times as much on advertising and sales as on research and development. One of its subsidiaries, Michigan Power Co., spent $15.50 on advertising for every $1 it spent on research.

Mr. President, I have excerpted the advertising and sales and research and development figures for AEP, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the figures were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMERICAN ELECTRIC POWER SYSTEM SUBSIDIARIES—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT VERSUS ADVERTISING AND SALES EXPENDITURES, 1973

Company	Total advertising and sales expenditures	Total R. & D. expenditures	Ratio of advertising and sales to R. & D.
Appalachian Power	$1,940,169	$640,467	3.02:1
Indiana-Michigan Electric Company	1,557,893	825,335	1.88:1
Kentucky Power	446,594	61,236	7.29:1
Kingsport Power	88,859	8,990	9.88:1
Michigan Power	94,333	6,052	15.58:1
Ohio Power	1,688,714	1,600,463	1.05:1
Wheeling Electric	141,609	15,709	9.01:1

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, it appears that the 1974 American Electric Power priorities will be even more dismal. For the last several months, AEP has been running a major advertising campaign with full page ads appearing almost weekly in the Washington Post, the New York Times, Newsweek, Time, and other national news publications. The campaign has been even more intense in subsidiaries' service areas, which run from the shores of Lake Michigan to Virginia's Roanoke Valley. The cost of the campaign has been estimated to be around $3.2 million.

In this era of the energy crisis, inflation and recession that $3.2 million could have been better devoted to rate relief for some of AEP's 1,560,000 residential consumers.

Hopefully, American Electric Power, and the other electric utilities will realize that the best way to improve their public image is not to use a slick advertising campaign, but to devote their time and money to providing the public cheaper, more efficient, pollution-free electricity.

It should be noted that last year the American Electric Power system established a record. Although it was one of the most profitable utility systems in the country its Federal income taxes reached a record low. The proof of that statement is in the subsidiaries' own reports to the Federal Power Commission, whose chairman provided the information to me. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Company	Total Federal income taxes as percent of total operating revenue	Net profit as percent of total operating revenue
Appalachian Power	0	22.1
Indiana-Michigan Electric	0	23.8
Kentucky Power	0	14.0
Kingsport Power	0	4.1
Michigan Power	0	6.1
Wheeling Electric	0	4.0

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, all taxpayers are indebted to Congressman VANIK and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation for their recent study on effective corporate tax rates. It is pertinent to my remarks in that the utility holding company to which I have referred, American Electric Power, enjoyed the same Federal tax-free status last year which characterized all but one of its subsidiaries. According to the Vanik study American Electric Power had an adjusted net income of $194,285,000. It not only paid no Federal income taxes. It accumulated a tax credit of $8,920,000.

AMERICAN-FLAG AIR CARRIER ACT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, as I am sure all of my colleagues are aware through recent news reports, Pan American World Airways has sustained severe economic difficulties in recent years as a result of many factors beyond the airline's control—not the least being restrictive routing authority.

Pan Am plays an important role in Alaska's transportation network and I have been very concerned for some years over the problems that Pan Am has faced.

I had hoped that before adjournment, the 93d Congress would have enacted legislation to assist Pan Am in overcoming its most difficult financial problems. However, due to the very limited time remaining and considering the absolutely essential legislation that must be passed prior to adjournment, it is apparent that legislation I had intended to offer to aid Pan Am cannot be considered at this time.

Still, Mr. President, I would like to briefly state what my proposal would do and, without objection, submit my proposal for incorporation in the Record in the hopes that my colleagues might have the opportunity to review it.

Basically, my proposal to assist Pan Am is quite similar to that plan which the Congress passed to aid American Motors during a time of financial crisis. My proposal would allow Pan Am to carry back losses it incurred in 1970 and 1971 and apply them against taxes paid by Pan Am in the preceding 10 years. Under present law only a 3-year carry-back is permitted and Pan Am has already depleted those benefits.

As Senator NELSON from Wisconsin stated in support of the American Motors bill, on August 9, 1967, "It would not cost the American taxpayer a nickel."

This is also true for Pan American, because if Pan American is sustained as a viable air carrier, its future Federal tax payments would be increased if, as provided under my proposed amendment, the carryforward of its 1970-1971 losses were eliminated. I should also point out that there would also be no revenue impact if Pan American were to be unable to regain its profitable position and were required to be merged with another airline. In such a case, the surviving or consolidated airline entity would, under present law, probably be entitled to utilize Pan American's losses against the future income of the combined entity. Under my proposal, the utilization of those losses would not be available and, consequently, any combined entity would be required to pay greater taxes on its future income. In addition, my amendment would have permitted the more than 32,000 Pan American employees to share in any eventual success to Pan American when it, hopefully, regains operational profitability, by providing that 25 percent of any tax refund resulting from the amendment would have been distributed to the employees through an employee stock ownership plan as Pan American gradually regained its former profitability position.

My proposal to extend the carry-back period for Pan Am would help insure the solvency of this important U.S. international airline. If action is not taken soon, Pan Am will find itself in an absolutely untenable financial condition which would make recovery almost an impossibility.

Again, it is most unfortunate that the Congress could not consider my proposal this year. However, I do intend to submit my plan to the 94th Congress in the hopes that it can be acted on expeditiously so as to be of positive assistance to Pan Am during this time of financial crisis.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have my amendment printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

At the appropriate place insert the following new section:

Sec. (a) This section may be cited as the "American Flag Air Carrier Act".

(b) Section 172 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to net operating loss carrybacks and carryovers) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(C)" after "subparagraphs" in paragraph (1) (A) (i),

(2) by striking out "In the case" in paragraph (1) (C) and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) Except as provided in clause (ii), in the case", and

(3) by adding at the end of paragraph (1) (C) the following:

"(ii) In the case of a taxpayer which is a regulated transportation corporation, satisfies the requirements of subsection (1), and is the common parent corporation of an affiliated group (as defined in section 1504 (a)) which made a consolidated return for each of the taxable years beginning on or after January 1, 1970, and ending on or before December 31, 1971, a consolidated net operating loss attributable to such taxpayer for any such taxable year shall be a net operating loss carryback to each of the 10 taxable years preceding the taxable year of such loss and shall not be a net operating loss carryover to any taxable year following the taxable year of such loss if a consolidated return was made for any of such preceding 10 taxable years during which the taxpayer was the common parent corporation of the affiliated group, such net operating loss shall be applied the consolidated taxable income of the affiliated group. If no consolidated return was filed for any such preceding year, the net operating loss shall be applied against the separate taxable income of such taxpayer."

(c) Section 172 of such Code is amended by redesignating subsection (l) as (m), and by inserting after subsection (k) the following new subsection:

"(1) General Requirement.—In order to satisfy the requirements of this subsection for any taxable year, a taxpayer must meet the requirements of paragraph (2) and of the American Flag Air Carrier Act.

"(2) Requirements relating to taxpayer and amount of loss.—A taxpayer meets the requirements of this paragraph if—

"(A) the amount of the taxpayer's net operating loss for the taxable year with respect to which the provisions of subsection (b) (1) (C) (ii) are to apply exceeds the sum of the taxable income (computed in accordance with the last two sentences of subsection (b) (1) (C) (ii)) for each of the 3 preceding taxable years of the taxpayers, and

"(B) for the taxable year of such loss, the taxpayer—

"(i) was a common carrier by air, subject to the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and operated under one or more certificates of public convenience and necessity issued under section 401(d) (1) or 401 (d) (2) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 authorizing the taxpayer to engage in the scheduled service carriage of persons in 'interstate air transportation', in 'overseas air transportation', and in 'foreign air transportation', as such terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1301), and

"(ii) had operating revenues from the furnishing or sale of both (I) 'domestic' and (II) 'international' and 'territorial' air transportation (as such terms are defined in Civil Aeronautics Board regulations), and at least 60 percent of such operating revenues for such year were derived from the furnishing or sale of international and territorial air transportation, as so defined."

(d) In order to meet the requirements of this subsection—

(1) A corporation (hereinafter referred to as "the employer") must establish an employee stock ownership plan (described in paragraph (2)) which is funded by transfers of employer securities from an escrow account in accordance with the provisions of subsection (e).

(2) The plan must be an individual account plan established in writing which—

(A) is a stock bonus plan, or a stock bonus and money purchase plan,

(B) is designed to invest primarily in employer securities, and

(C) meets such other requirements (similar to requirements, to the extent appropriate, which are applicable to employee stock ownership plans as defined in section 4975(e) (7) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

(3) In addition to any requirements applicable to deferred compensation plans under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, the plan must meet the requirements of section 401(a) (4) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and provide for vesting in accordance with the provisions of section 411 of such Code. For purposes of this paragraph, the plan must satisfy the requirements of section 411(a) (2) (A) of such Code and such requirements shall be applied to the plan by substituting "3 years" for "10 years" where "10 years" appears.

(4) The plan must provide that, at the close of each plan year, the plan will allocate to the account of each participant that portion of the employer securities transferred to the plan during that year which bears substantially the same proportion to the amount of all such securities allocated to all participants in the plan as the amount of compensation paid to such participant (disregarding any compensation in excess of $100,000 per year) bears to the compensation paid to all such participants during that year (disregarding any compensation in excess of $100,000 with respect to any participant).

(5) The plan must provide that each participant is entitled to direct the plan as to the manner in which any employer securities allocated to the account of the participant are to be voted.

(6) The plan must provide for participation by all employees of the employer and may provide for participation by employees of any corporation which is a member of a controlled group of corporations (within the meaning of section 1563(a) (4) and 1563(e) (3) (C) of such Code) which the employer is a member. The plan is not considered to have failed to meet the requirements of this paragraph solely because employees who are covered by a collectively-bargained agreement are excluded from participation if participation is offered to such employees (through their employee representatives) and the offer is not accepted within a reasonable time.

(7) The plan and the escrow agreement shall provide that if—

(A) the plan meets the requirements of section 401 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and

(B) the amounts involved in the required transfers of employer securities from the escrow account to the plan are in excess of the limitations contained in section 415 of such Code, the stock to be transferred which is in excess of such limits shall be transferred directly to the employees to whom it would be allocated if it were transferred to the plan.

(e) In order to meet the requirements of this subsection—

(1) The escrow account must be established by the employer under a written agreement. The escrow account must be held and administered by a bank which is qualified to hold assets under section 401(d) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and which is not a disqualified person (as defined in section 4975(e) (2) (other than subparagraphs (A) and (B) thereof) of such Code) with respect to the plan.

(2) Within 10 days after the escrow account is established, and before making a claim for adjustment or refund under section 172(b) (1) (C) (ii) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the employer must transfer employer securities to the escrow account having an aggregate value at the time of transfer of at least 25 percent of the total amount of the refund or credit of any overpayment of tax claimed by the employer in its carryback adjustment application or claim for refund under such section.

(3) The agreement under which the escrow account is established must provide that each year there will be transferred to the plan, not later than 10 days after the due date (including any extensions of time) for filing the employer's return of tax under chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, a number of the employer securities equal in value to 10 percent of the employer's net income after income taxes without taking into account any deduction for contributions to the plan from the escrow account.

(4) The agreement must provide that, by the end of the 120th month after the escrow account is established, either all of the employer securities in the escrow account will have been transferred to the plan, or (if less) employer securities having a total value equal to at least an amount equal to the amount required to have been transferred to the plan under paragraph (2) will have been transferred to the plan. The agreement may provide that, if there are any employer securities remaining in the escrow account after application of the provision described in the preceding sentence, the remaining securities may be distributed to the corporation.

(5) The agreement must provide that any charges incurred with respect to the escrow account will be paid by the employer, except that, to the extent that dividends paid on employer securities held in such account are sufficient to cover such charges the dividends shall be used to pay such charges, to the extent that such dividends exceed such charges the excess shall be used to reimburse the employer for any such charges previously paid by the employer, and to the extent that such dividends exceed such charges and reimbursements the excess shall be paid to the plan.

(6) The agreement must provide that no transfers may be made from the escrow account except as provided in this subsection.

(f) For purposes of this section, the term—

(1) "employer securities" means common stock issued by the employer with voting power and dividend rights no less favorable than the voting power and dividend rights of other common stock issued by the employer,

(2) "value" means the average of closing prices of the employer securities, as reported by a national exchange on which securities are listed, for the twenty consecutive trading days immediately preceding the date of transfer or allocation of such securities.

(g) If, at any time within 120 months following the date on which a person claims a refund for overpayment of tax or adjustment of tax through a net operating loss carryback under section 172(b) (1) (C) (ii) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, that person fails to meet any requirement imposed under this section or under any obligation undertaken to comply with a requirement of this section, he is liable to the United States for a civil penalty of an amount equal to the amount involved in such failure. The amount involved shall not exceed the amount of such refund or adjustment, and shall not be less than one-half of one percent of the amount such person is required to transfer to the escrow account described in this section during such 120-month period. The amount of such penalty may be collected by the Secretary of the Treasury in the same manner in which a deficiency in the payment of Federal income tax may be collected.

LESLIE C. ARENDS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this year marks the end of a remarkable congressional career. Congressman LES ARENDS has been in the House of Representatives since 1935 and has been Republican whip since 1943. He is also the most senior Member of the Illinois delegation in Congress.

Born in Melvin, Ill., LES ARENDS served in World I and maintained his belief in a strong national defense as a senior member of the House Armed Services Committee.

He has been most effective as Republican whip in the House and his voluntary retirement at the end of this Congress closes the book on a remarkable chapter in Illinois and congressional history.

I came to know LES ARENDS well during the 1950's while serving as president of the United Republican Fund in Illinois. LES ARENDS was always willing to attend and address our meetings. Our relationship has continued since my election to the Senate and I have enjoyed seeing him in action in the House for the past 8 years.

December 19, 1974

I wish LES and his wonderful wife, Betty, all the best as an impressive House career comes to a close and a new, I trust, equally exciting life opens ahead for them both.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE, U.S. SENATE

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, Congress has no more important task than to provide the American people with a stable economy and a sound dollar. Caught in an economic vise of soaring costs and the shrinking purchasing power of the dollar, the people have the right to expect that Congress will make every effort to alleviate these pressures that are producing instability in the economy.

I am indeed pleased to report that the Committee on Appropriations has been moving with some effectiveness in the handling of appropriations bills for the 1975 fiscal year in its purpose to combat the effects of inflation.

We have made a concentrated effort—and with some measure of success—to reduce administration spending requests for the current fiscal year to reasonable levels. These efforts should be of assistance in turning back the rising tide of inflation.

Fifteen appropriations bills for fiscal year 1975—including two supplemental appropriations bills and a special energy bill—have been reported by the Appropriations Committee so far this year. Eleven have been signed into public law.

Eleven of these measures have been substantially and significantly reduced below the budget estimates submitted by the administration to the Committee on Appropriations.

We have, Mr. President, made a net reduction of $6,147,871,387 under the budget in fiscal year 1975 new obligatory authority.

The reductions made by Congress in the President's budget requests so far this year are:

Legislative—$14,196,735.
Agriculture, Environmental, and Consumer Protection—$58,683,100.
District of Columbia—$26,600,000.
Transportation—$256,499,552.
HUD, Space, Science, Veterans—$221,001,000.
Labor, HEW—$485,239,000.

1. Additionally, the Congress has considered requests to rescind fiscal year 1975 budget authority in the amount of $672,116,000; of that total, $131,481,000 has been rescinded (H.R. 17565).

Note: The budget for 1975, as submitted Feb. 4, 1974, tentatively estimated total new budget authority for 1975 at $361,684,000,000 gross ($322,141,000,000 net of some $39,543,000,000 interest and intergovernmental transactions and certain so-called proprietary receipts handled as offsets for budget purposes only). Of this total, an estimated $163,692,000,000 does not require current action by Congress; it involves permanent appropriations such as interest and various trust funds already provided in basic law. Virtually all of the remaining $197,992,000,000 is for consideration at this session in the appropriation bills. About $9,024,000,000 of the $197,992,000,000 was shown in the January budget as being "for later transmittal" for supplemental requirements under present law, new legislation, and allowances for contingencies and civilian pay raises.

TOBACCO

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, the December 17 edition of the Record included an insertion by the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. Moss) of an article and editorial from the Journal of the American Medical Association. This material was presented as justification for the Senator's continuing and unsuccessful effort to eliminate the tobacco support program and all that it means to the millions of Americans who grow, manufacture, and consume tobacco and the favorable impact it has on this Nation's balance of trade.

The editorial board of the Journal of the American Medical Association and the publication's editor who have joined together in the December 16 issue in an attack on the competence and credibility of Congress in dealing with the health needs of the American people. One pleads guilty to "contempt of Congress" and the other warns legislators to heed his colleague's "stern challenge."

It is an article entitled "Government-Subsidized Death and Disability," written by Weldon J. Walker, M.D., of the editorial board of JAMA. The author is outraged that Congress is using "our tax money in many ways to subsidize increased death and disability among our citizens as well as those of the rest of the world." This rhetoric is supported by an editorial entitled "The New Seduction," in which Robert H. Moser, M.D., editor of JAMA, endorses the demand for "an end to Federal subsidy loans and tax breaks for industries that support cigarette production."

It is ironic that these two medical men question the competence of Congress, yet do not hesitate to pontificate on matters of taxation, advertising, regulation, and legislation.

Let me say that in conjuring up an image of a vast flow of tax dollars subsidizing tobacco, the two doctors are dealing in a delusion which stems from either ignorance of the facts or an unwillingness to accept them.

Surely they could have determined—and should have determined—these facts before contributing to the unceasing and unthinking chorus of congressional detractors. All that would have been required was reference to the Department of Agriculture's tobacco situation report of September 1974. This document would have exercised their delusion. It reveals the following:

In fiscal year 1974 new loans by the government made under the tobacco support program totalled $38 million. During the same period, loans repaid to the government totalled $269 million. Thus the so-called "shameful" tax subsidy actually represented a net gain of $231 million for the Federal Government.

The authors could also have learned that the so-called tobacco export subsidy cost $23 million in fiscal year 1974, in order to make American tobacco competitive with tobacco produced by Rhodesia, Bulgaria, Mainland China, and other countries. They could also have learned that this subsidy helped to produce close to $1 billion on the favorable side of the U.S. balance of trade.

Now let me deal with their premise for holding Congress in contempt and for demanding that the tobacco support program be scrapped. This premise is, of course, their strong belief that tobacco smoking is responsible for "increased death and disability among our citizens." To do so, I need not stray outside of my area of competence as they have. Rather I need only refer to their previous publications in JAMA.

For instance in the December 16 issue both doctors attribute the sharp decline in the death rate from coronary heart disease to a reduction in smoking. Dr. Walker says that—

This dramatic breakthrough against coronary disease apparently resulted chiefly from a modest reduction in tobacco consumption.

Dr. Moser agrees, and adds that "improved dietary habits" can also be correlated with this decline.

But in the March 1974 issue of JAMA, Dr. Moser, commenting editorially on an article by Dr. Walker dealing with the decline in heart disease rates, is not so sure about its reality or its causes.

Here is how he expressed his reservations:

Of course, we all would like to believe that the improved mortality statistics are not some subtle artifact of numbers and really reflect increasing public awareness about coronary risk factors. However, there is no apparent evidence that western man is moving toward a more spartan life style (unless it is the occasional chap who runs out of gas on the highway); there are no indicators to suggest a decrease in cigarette smoking or a decline in caloric or saturated fat intake. Certainly, there is no immediate evidence that the jogging (or other daily "routine exercise") population is expanding. The coffee drinkers remain in suspended animation.

One is inclined to suspect that, if indeed, the statistics are valid they could represent earlier detection and better management of acute myocardial infarction.

What they attributed to good medical practice in March, is transformed into an attack on Congress, and tobacco, in December.

Mr. President, when Senator Moss' insertion appeared and I read the material by Drs. Walker and Moser, I was pleased to learn that the Tobacco Institute had already responded with a letter to Dr. James H. Sammons, executive director of the American Medical Association.

I ask unanimous consent that the considered and detailed reply to the JAMA material prepared by Horace R. Kornegay, president of the Tobacco Institute, be printed in the Record. I do so in the interest of fairness, objectivity, and in defense of the hard work, devotion, dedication, and integrity of Congress which I can assure you I do not hold in contempt but in the highest esteem.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE TOBACCO INSTITUTE, INC.,
Washington, D.C. December 19, 1974.
Dr. JAMES H. SAMMONS,
Executive Vice President,
American Medical Association,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR DR. SAMMONS: An article and an editorial in the December 16 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association both of which were publicized in a news release issued by your organization last week, have the effect of misinforming readers and debasing JAMA's professional standards.

It is inconceivable that a respected medical journal could put into print such a package of falsehoods, half-truths and gross inaccuracies. I refer to an article entitled "Government-Subsidized Death and Disability," by a member of JAMA's editorial board, Dr. Weldon J. Walker, and the accompanying editorial endorsement by the editor, Dr. Robert H. Moser, entitled "The New Seduction."

This journalistic offense cannot be due solely to lack of expertise on the part of the writers, although inexperience no doubt played a part in that the physicians were here dealing with matters beyond their disciplines.

There is, however, no explanation for the degree to which the author and the editor misled the subscribers and, because of the news release, the general public, about certain medical and health phenomena.

We are told by JAMA that a decline in U.S. heart disease death rates began with cessation of smoking after what is called the "watershed" 1964. Report of the Advisory Committee to the Surgeon General on Smoking and Health. We are given as sources for the heart disease rates an article in the March 4, 1974, JAMA, also by Dr. Walker, and for the smoking data Statistical Bulletin No. 523: Annual Report on Tobacco Statistics 1973, published last April by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The March article gave an incomplete citation of "Vital Statistics of United States," and provided no further identification.

During that same month, however—last March—the National Center for Health Statistics of the U.S. Public Health Service published "Mortality Trends for Leading Causes of Death, United States—1950-69." It is evident from a footnote to Dr. Walker's current article that this publication was familiar to him.

A comparison of cigarette smoking rates (per-capita consumption) from "Tobacco Statistics" and coronary death rates (age adjusted) from "Mortality Trends" can leave little doubt that 1) the reported decline in the latter began more than a decade before the Surgeon General's report; 2) this decline persisted over the twenty-year period (1950-69) in spite of the general increase in per-capita consumption of cigarettes and 3) the reduction in pounds of cigarette tobacco per capita was only one percent between 1950 and 1959 and 16 percent between 1960 and 1969, yet the reduction in heart disease death rates remained constant at eight percent for each decade.

Year	Cigarettes per capita	Heart disease death rates
1950	3,522	307.6
1951	3,744	302.9
1952	3,896	299.6
1953	3,778	298.9
1954	3,546	294.7
1955	3,597	287.5
1956	3,650	288.7
1957	3,755	293.0
1958	3,953	289.3
1959	4,073	283.3
1960	4,171	286.2
1961	4,266	278.7
1962	4,265	287.7
1963	4,345	285.4
1964	4,194	276.9
1965	4,258	275.6
1966	4,287	275.8
1967	4,280	267.7
1968	4,186	270.0
1969	3,993	262.3

Thus the illogic of the author's opposition to federal tobacco programs becomes obvious

when the pertinent data are examined in their full context.

Nevertheless, Dr. Walker amazingly states that "this dramatic breakthrough against coronary disease apparently resulted chiefly from a modest reduction in tobacco consumption." Although this claim apparently suited his current purpose, it is noteworthy that in his March article he at least gave partial credit to "the vigorous educational program against risk factors"—not the plural—prevalent in recent years. In any event, his failure to recognize any advances by the medical profession in treatment of coronary diseases in the past two decades must be shocking to JAMA's readers.

Insofar as peptic ulcer is concerned, Dr. Walker evidently just did not read, on page 7 in "Mortality Trends", the very explicit statement: "Mortality from peptic ulcer as measured by age-adjusted death rates decreased about 28 percent between 1950 and 1969." Dr. Walker's contention that the reported drop in peptic ulcer death rates dates only from a 1962 peak is additionally fallacious in light of the point made on page 53 of the same source document that changes in the method of coding causes of death distorted the reported rates.

Having presented such a contrived picture of the health aspects of this matter, the JAMA article continues in like vein in its discussion of government tobacco programs.

Inexplicably, the discussion begins with a contention that "$11.5 billion is spent annually in the U.S. for health care costs resulting from cigarette smoking." The author's reference for this startling claim is "Mortality Trends", as identified above. The truth of the matter is that this publication deals neither with health care costs nor any aspect of smoking.

The statement that the government price support for tobacco has risen 34 percent since 1964 is a complete non-sequitur. In fact, price support levels are based on farmers' costs, and if the Congress had not modified the formula for these computations in 1960, the rise would have been far more substantial, as farmers' costs have risen sharply. The foolishness of this point is the complete omission of reference to the application of the formula. In fact, government-held tobacco loan collateral has been declining steadily and is expected by the Department of Agriculture to vanish during the next year. A simple inquiry would have revealed that demand is exceeding supply and that the government is very rapidly selling off its collateral stocks of tobacco. The author should have known, in view of his contention that the tobacco program is irresponsible financially, that these sales are being made at very substantial profits to the government in view of the rising market price of tobacco.

Dr. Walker implies that an increase in the percentage of cigarettes produced free of federal tax during the past decade, from 7.5 to 9, is a sinister trend. Actually, this has nothing to do with U.S. health trends—it is entirely due to an increase in the number of cigarettes exported for sale and consumption overseas, none of which are subject to U.S. taxes, but which contribute substantially to the U.S. balance of trade.

The statement that federal taxes on tobacco have remained unchanged is a deliberate effort to mislead. While the tax rate has remained unchanged, federal tax revenues increased 7.5 percent from 1968 to $2,221,000,000 in 1973. During the same period, state and local tobacco tax collections rose 61.4 percent, or nearly $1.2 billion, to $3,093,000,000.

The statement which makes it appear that the government carries a heavy burden of tobacco under loan is, of course, completely erroneous, totally unsupported by the facts. As noted above, such stocks are rapidly declining to zero.

The statement about "Washington's spending $80 billion for health care" is attributed by Dr. Walker to the editor of the New England Journal of Medicine. What the editor, Dr. Ingelfinger, actually wrote in the issue of that journal which was cited by Dr. Walker was: "The amount of money spent on health care in this country now exceeds $80 billion per year." Dr. Walker's misrepresentation is self-evident and needs no comment.

The final blow to credulity is struck by the editor in discussing cigarette advertising. He begins by incorrectly ascribing the discontinuation of broadcast cigarette advertising to action by the Federal Communications Commission. The facts, of course, are that in 1969 the cigarette industry volunteered to discontinue this form of advertising, and Congressional enactment resulted. The editor's treatment of this subject demonstrates his adroitness in substituting polemics for facts. It is on that note that his editorial, mercifully, terminates.

As we observed at the outset, it is lamentable that the irresponsible material put forth by Drs. Moser and Walker appeared in a publication of the calibre of the Journal of the American Medical Association. This material is characteristic of the outpourings of the adversaries of tobacco in recent years. It is virtually lacking in factual basis; it is almost entirely emotional, even fanatical in its approach. Ironically, it is precisely this approach which has only confused rather than enlightened the public and served to obscure rather than illuminate the medical and scientific questions which must be answered through objective research on smoking and health.

In light of the seriousness of the foregoing, we request favorable consideration of the publication of this communication in JAMA at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely,

HORACE R. KORNEGAY.

REPRESENTATIVE H. R. GROSS

Mr. McCURE. Mr. President, I know how he would object to wasting the taxpayer's money on tributes, so I will keep it short.

Today marks the last day that H. R. Gross will grace the floor of the House of Representatives. Perhaps the greatest tribute to him comes from the sigh of relief that such news elicits from our liberal friends.

It is true that Mr. Gross has dedicated himself to serving the best interests of the taxpayer—so much so that he comes about as close as anyone I know of to being the indispensable man.

We will never really know how much money he has saved the taxpayer, because we will never really know how many schemes were discarded in the knowledge that "it will never get by H. R."

He has left an indelible mark upon the Congress and will be missed by friend and foe alike.

THE PLATTE RIVER IN NEBRASKA

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, there has been much comment and controversy surrounding a report that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is proposing to declare certain portions of the Platte River in Nebraska "navigable." I believe many persons misunderstand the idea of navigability as it pertains to the law.

For many years, the primary concern of the corps in its regulatory program was protection of navigation. Activities in navigable waters of the United States were authorized if they did not unduly interfere with navigation.

However, in the 1960's, the public and the Congress became more and more interested in the environmental aspects of these activities.

Following the passage of the Federal Water Pollution Control Amendments of 1972—which declared all waters of the United States "navigable" for purposes of the administration of the act—the corps moved to reevaluate its position on determining "navigability" under its regulatory program.

In an Army Corps of Engineers regulation issued in September 1972, the concept of navigability was broadened significantly.

Much more liberal guidelines were set forth for determinations of "navigability" and district engineers—including the Omaha District Engineer—were told:

Although conclusive determinations of navigability can be made only by Federal Courts, those made by Federal agencies are nevertheless accorded substantial weight by the courts. It is therefore necessary that when jurisdictional questions arise, district personnel carefully investigate those waters which may be subject to Federal regulatory jurisdiction . . . as the resulting determination may have substantial impact upon a judicial body. Official determinations by an agency made in the past can be revised or reversed as necessary to reflect changed rules or interpretations of the law.

In a subsequent letter, in November 1972, the director of civil works for the corps explicitly directed that the September regulation be implemented. He said:

It is emphasized that the provisions of the new regulations are to be implemented immediately. Accordingly, District Engineers will initiate continuing programs for review of the waterbodies within their geographical area of responsibility to insure that the navigable status of each waterbody is consistent with the referenced regulation. Review programs should be accomplished with existing resources. Whenever a question arises regarding the navigability of a specific waterbody, it is anticipated that the review of its navigable status will assume a priority.

On May 10, 1973, the Department of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, published proposed regulations to serve as interim guidance to all Corps of Engineers installations. These proposed regulations prescribed the policy, practice and procedure to be followed by all Corps of Engineers installations and activities in connection with applications for permits authorizing structures and work in or affecting navigable waters of the United States pursuant to the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1899, the discharge of dredged or fill material into navigable waters pursuant to section 404 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act and the transportation of dredged material for the purpose of dumping it into ocean waters pursuant to section 103 of the Marine Protection, Research and Sanctuaries Act of 1972.

In September 1973, Maj. Gen. J. W. Morris, director of civil works for the corps, restated the initiatives expected for district engineers to proceed to review all waters within their jurisdictions for a determination of navigability. In a letter to the Missouri River Division Engineer, Morris said:

District Engineer(s) should continue to undertake appropriate programs for the review of all waterbodies within their geographical area of responsibility to determine which of these waterbodies fall within the jurisdictional definition of "navigable waters of the United States" as expressed in ER 1165-2-302, "Water Resource Policies and Authorities—Definition of Navigable Waters of the United States," dated 11 September 1972. The need for these reviews and determinations is extremely important, and should be conducted on a priority basis. It will serve to define the extent of the regulatory program. It is anticipated that the public, increasingly aware of the Corps' expanded regulatory permit program and the extent and magnitude of statutory and judicially developed criminal and civil fines and other penalties and actions for violations of these regulatory statutes, will look to the Corps in increasing numbers for an indication as to whether their proposed activities require Corps permits.

On April 3, 1974, the corps published final regulations on these matters in the Federal Register.

It says in part:

Several comments and questions were received concerning the different definitions which were assigned to the terms "navigable waters of the United States" and "navigable waters". In this regard, it is noted that the Corps' regulatory authority under the River and Harbors Act of 1899 speaks in terms of "navigable waters of the United States." This term has received the benefit of over 100 years of judicial definition and interpretation which has largely been based on the constitutional extent to which the authority of the United States can extend over the nation's waterways. Recognizing that the extent of Federal authority over the nation's waterways has been an evolutionary one and that recent judicial decisions have provided additional guidance and direction as to the scope and extent of this jurisdiction, the Corps recently undertook an extensive review of all of the judicial decisions in this area, and substantially revised and refined its administrative definition of this term to more accurately reflect and incorporate this judicial guidance.

In line with this procedure, "navigable waters of the United States" has been defined as follows for corps purposes:

Navigable waters of the United States are those waters which are presently, or have been in the past, or may be in the future susceptible for use for purposes of interstate or foreign commerce. A determination of navigability, once made, applies laterally over the entire surface of the water body, and is not extinguished by later actions or events which impede or destroy navigable capacity.

Given these directives, the Omaha district engineer obviously had no choice but to proceed with a study to determine if the Platte and other rivers within the area were "navigable" under the definition of the law.

A very detailed study of the river was conducted to determine whether under the legal definition of "navigable" the Platte could be declared as such. After much review and consultation, Col. Russell Glenn, Omaha district engineer, recommended to the Office of the Chief of Engineers in Washington that the river to the extent designated in his report be declared "navigable." This procedure was in line with the law and in response to Army directives.

I certainly did not instigate or originate this study or make any recommendation that the Platte be declared navigable. That is the responsibility of the Corps of Engineers.

My role in this was in October 1974 to inform the people of Nebraska of the corps activity. This was done through a statement to the press. In fact, I have asked the Chief of Engineers to postpone a decision on the navigability declaration until at least February so that the people of Nebraska may have the opportunity to understand the ramifications of the proposed action and also to register such views as they may have on the subject. He has agreed. I hope during the interim a better understanding of the corps activities is gained.

Private ownership of the river bed certainly is not threatened should the river be declared navigable. Naturally, however, owners are subject to the Federal law.

The corps will not "take over" or "confiscate" the river. Property rights are affected only in that permission must be obtained for channel diversion or dumping. The jurisdiction of the corps is quite limited in this regard. For example, it has no jurisdiction over the quantity of water to be used for irrigation, nor can it determine priorities for irrigation.

I think everyone would agree that individual or private interests do not have the right to make the Platte unuseable for others. The purpose of the corps action is to prevent that from occurring insofar as its authority goes. Currently, permits from the State department of environmental control are required for effluent discharge into the Platte for the exact same reason—to insure this great natural resource is not destroyed.

Under provisions of the Federal Water Pollution Control Amendments of 1972, the Environmental Protection Agency has interpreted the meaning of "navigable waters" as all waters of the United States. As a result, the State of Nebraska has classified all of its rivers and streams and put them under the control of the State department of environmental control for the purposes of controlling effluent discharges from feedlots, municipalities and commercial activities. In June of this year, the EPA was satisfied the State had sufficient standards and turned permit issuing authority and enforcement over to the State. In effect, then, the Governor has already conceded the Platte is "navigable."

Under section 404 of the same 1972 environmental protection law, authority to control certain activities in U.S. rivers and streams—other than that delegated to the EPA—was granted to the corps. As has been pointed out, the corps elected to interpret the meaning of "navigability" in a more restricted way than the EPA.

Once the river is declared navigable, a Federal permit is required for various activities in and on the river.

The following excerpts from the Federal Register describe the corps permit authority:

Section 9 of the River and Harbor Act approved March 3, 1899, prohibits the construction of any dam or dike across any navigable water of the United States in the absence of Congressional consent and approval of the plans by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of the Army. Where the navigable portions of the waterbody lie wholly within the limits of a single State, the structure may be built under authority of the legislature of that State, if the location and plans or any modification thereof, are approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of the Army. The instrument of authorization is designated a permit.

Section 10 of the River and Harbor Act prohibits the unauthorized obstruction or alteration of any navigable water of the United States, the excavation from or depositing of material in such waters, or the accomplishment of any other work affecting the course, location, condition, or capacity of such waters are unlawful unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of the Army. The instrument of authorization is designated a permit or letter of permission.

Section 13 of the River and Harbor Act provides that the Secretary of the Army, whenever the Chief of Engineers determines that anchorage and navigation will not be injured thereby, may permit the discharge of refuse into navigable waters. In the absence of a permit, such discharge or refuse is prohibited. While the prohibition of this section, known as the Refuse Act, is still in effect, the permit authority of the Secretary of the Army has been superseded by the permit authority provided the Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency, under sections 402 and 405 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

Section 14 of the River and Harbor Act provides that the Secretary of the Army on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers may grant permission for the temporary occupation or use of any sea wall, bulkhead, jetty, dike, levee, wharf, pier, or other work built by the United States. This permission will be granted by an appropriate real estate instrument in accordance with existing real estate regulations.

Section 1 of the River and Harbor Act of June 13, 1902 allows any persons or corporations desiring to improve any navigable river at their own expense and risk to do so upon the approval of the plans and specifications by the Secretary of the Army and the Chief of Engineers. Improvements constructed under this authority, which are primarily in Federal project areas, remain subject to the control and supervision of the Secretary of the Army and the Chief of Engineers. The instrument of authorization is designated a permit.

Section 404 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act authorizes the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, to issue permits, after notice and opportunity for public hearings, for the discharge of dredged or fill material into the navigable waters at specified disposal sites.

I think those sections of the law very clearly described the Army's authority in this area.

I think the issue of Federal domination of State interests in this matter is totally false. Currently, there is no State agency with authority comparable to that which would be exercised by the corps if the Platte is declared navigable. Clearly, there is a regulatory void in this area. I believe that void should be filled. If the State legislature chooses to designate a State agency to assume control over the Platte, it will not conflict with the corps. When a Federal permit for construction or other work in the river is requested, the corps will not act on the request until the State's requirements are satisfied. There will be coordination and cooperation between the State and Federal authorities.

I favor the supervision and the proper control of activities in and on the river. The question is whether the Federal Government or the State government should have authority, or whether the authority should be shared. It is for the Nebraska Unicameral to decide what part, if any, it will assume. To the extent that a declaration of navigability under the Federal law will result in bringing about sound and wholesome protection by either the Federal or State governments, or both, I approve.

I have stopped short of favoring the Corps of Engineers report recommending a navigability declaration because that recommendation is not yet completed. I do not feel I should endorse a report that has not been made final. That final point is determined by the Chief of Engineers.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON LIBRARY AND INFORMATION SERVICES IN 1976

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to see that the House and the Senate conferees have acted quickly on Senate Joint Resolution 40. Swift action was particularly important with regard to the amendment that the Senator from Rhode Island and I introduced to make some needed clarifications and changes in the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act. Without the speedy enactment of these amendments, many institutions of higher education would find themselves facing some serious problems with the beginning of the new year. I urge the President to sign this legislation into law without delay.

The conferees did make some changes in our amendments. I was pleased to see that they added language which specifically says that an educational institution cannot require a potential student to waive his rights of access to his records as a condition for admission to, receipt of financial aid from, or receipt of any other services or benefits from such an institution or agency. It should be further noted that anything done by an institution which has the effect of coercing a student into signing a waiver should be treated as requiring him to do so and, therefore, would be in conflict with the law.

I would also hope that educational institutions would not act prejudicially against potential students who refuse to waive their rights of access, but, instead, judge their applications on their merits. A student who does not meekly bow to institutional pressures to waive his rights is not thereby demonstrating a bad character, but is only properly exercising his basic right to see material which may affect important decisions made about him. An institution which automatically thinks poorly of such a student actually reflects poorly on its own procedures and attitudes by doing so.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that several items relating to the question of the general value of confidential letters of recommendation be inserted into the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I was somewhat disappointed to see that the conferees broadened some of the provisions relating to release of student records without consent, so that various private organizations and government agencies will be able to obtain personally identifiable information without the consent of the parents or students involved. Of course, language has also been added restricting the use of such information, and I would urge HEW to develop strict regulations regarding the use and protection of such personally identifiable information, and to enforce them fully.

With regard to all of the exceptions allowed from the requirement of individual consent for the release of personal records or information, I would urge educational agencies and institutions to act prudently, to construe narrowly, and only to allow access to or release of such information from such records as is specifically and directly related to and required for the legitimate purposes of the requesting individual, agency, or organization—not simply all the records or information therein that may exist on a student—in order that the general privacy of students and their parents may be preserved.

Institutions are required by the law to provide parents, students, and former students with access to individual student records, but the law does not in all cases require that the institution provide a copy of the records if so desired. I would nonetheless urge institutions, as far as they feel they can reasonably do so, to be willing to provide a copy of such records to parents, students, or former students, for the cost of reproduction.

One provision of the amendment would not allow parents or students to have access to the personal notes and files of individual school personnel which serve simply as memory aids and which are not revealed to other persons, except a substitute school employee, who performs the duties of another when that person is absent. It is not intended that this exception be abused by allowing regular school personnel, or persons outside the school, routinely to rotate through courses and classes, et cetera, for the purpose of effectively gaining access to another's notes and evaluations, which that person is himself unwilling to otherwise transmit to others, for fear that parents or students would have access to them.

Another provision of the amendment offered to Senate Joint Resolution 40 would allow only the conduct of hearings to be held in the regions. I would expect that representatives of the office designated to administer the law, or of the review board established in conjunction with it, would preside at such hearings, in order to obtain information needed for the deliberations of the office and the review board located at the HEW headquarters in Washington, D.C. I would also expect that, since it is a necessary activity involved in the preparation for the conduct of hearings, local HEW personnel would be able, if so directed, to gather information, materials, and evidence relevant to the concerns and purposes of such a hearing.

The law provides parents and students with the opportunity for a hearing at the educational institution in order to challenge and correct the contents of school records about them—or their children. I would certainly hope that such hearings would be held before a person—or persons—who has no direct interest in the matter at hand.

Mr. President, I would like to thank the Senator from Rhode Island and the staff of the Education Subcommittee for the unusual cooperation which they have given me and my staff in the course of the preparation of our joint amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 40. I believe that the amendment will satisfactorily resolve the legitimate potential problems that have been raised in connection with the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act, thereby enabling institutions to swiftly implement its provisions so as to protect the privacy of students and their parents and enable them to begin exercising their rights under the law. OF COLLEGES AND CANDOR

TO THE EDITOR:

There is much consternation voiced by the academic community that the Buckley Amendment will destroy the venerable institution of the professorial letter of recommendation by raising the veil of confidentiality. Such will indeed be true if professors do not take the trouble to tell unqualified applicants that they cannot write positive letters, and if they write things they cannot tell applicants to their faces. To require the contrary of professors is to ask that they act with honesty and understanding toward young people who place their futures in their hands. Even more, it will mean that professors will have to know their students. Perhaps this is asking too much of the academic profession, in which case the venerable institution deserves to be destroyed.

RE THE BUCKLEY AMENDMENT: PROFESSORS AND ADMINISTRATORS SHOULD LEARN TO WRITE RESPONSIBLE LETTERS

TO THE EDITOR:

I was dismayed at reading the recent article [The Chronicle, Oct. 21], which discussed the possibility of changing the Buckley amendment. The article indicated that leaders of college associations are trying to round up support for a "resolution that would keep the bill from taking effect until July 1."

This would be a mistake.

I am strongly in favor of the Buckley amendment. It is imperative in this age of advanced technology, with computerized record-keeping practices, that the rights of confidentiality and access, for parents and students, be insured.

The reaction among college educators who are reluctant for students to see their letters of recommendation because it would, ipso facto, mean the demise of candid evaluations, is irresponsible. It is the job of administrators and faculty to write, or learn to write, responsible letters including candid evaluations of students, whether the student sees the letter or not.

If college administrators and faculty would spend more time and energy learning how to write responsible letters, rather than trying to evade or circumvent the law, perhaps our institutions of higher education would be more humane.

PRINCETON, N.J.
Sen. James L. Buckley's amendment to the elementary-secondary education act provides that students in post-high-school institutions shall have "the right to inspect and review any and all official records, files, and data directly related to them, including all material that is incorporated into each student's cumulative record folder, and intended for school use or to be available to parties outside the school or school system.—The Editor

TO THE EDITOR:

I am surprised at the concern raised by Stanford President Richard Lyman [The Chronicle, Oct. 7] over the opening of student records containing confidential letters of recommendation. The purpose of such letters, solicited by applicants for admission to various programs, is to provide informed observation of an individual's potential for success in, usually, an undergraduate or graduate degree course.

Presuming that selection committees extend offers of acceptance to the best qualified candidates, it follows that recommendations made on their behalf will have been positive and persuasive influences in the evaluation process that was used.

If a student so chosen and ultimately enrolled is later able to see the evidence on which his acceptance was based, I cannot imagine that he, the writers of recommendations, or the selection method itself would in any way be damaged.

Indeed, many recommenders already use a straightforward approach with students who request a letter of reference by requiring a priori a conference with the student and a review of pertinent materials relating specifically to his application.

Often such a contact results in a mutual agreement on the general approach to be taken in the proposed letter; if the student feels that the potential recommender's comments will not adequately complement other aspects of his application, he is free to search out another reference. It would appear that such "shopping" has benefits for both parties and for the educational institutions that receive the recommendations because it serves to eliminate uninformed and insubstantial comments about students.

It is essential for young adults in programs of higher education to ascertain and understand the way in which their manner, character, and intellectual productivity affect others whose experience and expertise enables them to evaluate performance accurately.

One way to assist in this process is to allow students to review judgments made of them at one level as they propose to gain admission to the next, after such evaluations have served their purpose; I believe that the Buckley amendment will facilitate this kind of important self-scrutiny.

STANDARD ENGLISH IS A NECESSARY TOOL IN TODAY'S WORLD—AND SO ARE STANDARDIZED TESTS

TO THE EDITOR:

As a member of the National Council of Teachers of English, I take exception to your article of Oct. 29, concerning the English composition addition to the ... test. I feel your article ... in promoting the negative arguments and merely touching upon the positive.

We are no longer living in the era of the '60's, and though some of our more liberal members may mourn those exciting times, I feel that we must face the unpleasant (to some) realities of the '70's. These realities include the fact that to be accepted in standard society, by standard business, and in standard job placement, the students we teach must be able to read and write standard English. I do not say it is "better" than other forms. I do say it is a necessary tool in today's world.

Acceptance of students on the basis of test results is a college's prerogative. I would see no reason for not accepting students on the basis of their scores, but I do see a very real reason for using the scores in placement.

I, too, enjoy the controversy and "intellectual" debate found in ivory towers, but I feel we must also face reality and teach our students, as best we can, the necessities for survival in an increasingly upsetting society.

CONFIDENTIALITY OF RECOMMENDATIONS—IS IT REALLY NECESSARY?

(By Kenneth Burns, Humboldt State College, and Earl F. Carnes, University of Southern California)

The process of choosing teachers for a given position depends rather heavily upon the use of what is presently called the "confidential file." This confidential file is composed for the most part of letters of recommendation written about the candidate by people with whom he has come into prolonged contact—either academically or in the student-teaching program.

There are growing pressures to have this confidentiality removed and to force the disclosure of these ratings and recommendations to the individual involved. On the positive side there is the school of thought that these recommendations would be more valuable if they were disclosed to the individual involved, that comments made about a job applicant or employee, if discussed in an open, constructive manner, could be more helpful to that person than if these comments were maintained in a confidential file and kept secret.

However, in any controversy concerning the confidentiality of recommendations, those in favor of retaining confidentiality plead that its loss would make the recommendations less useful, would lead to meaningless statements and vague platitudes, and the result would be bland letters of no value to school administrators.

For years the confidentiality and reactions to it have been the subject of heated discussions at educational placement meetings, nationally and regionally. In 1966, with the cooperation of the California Educational Placement Association, a study was proposed to determine if a loss of confidentiality would actually damage the efficacy of recommendations concerning teacher candidates. The project was limited to first-time teachers who were graduating with a teaching credential in June of 1967. No effort was made to include experienced teachers or administrators. This paper is a report of that study.

METHOD

The basic hypothesis of this study was that if recommendations written about beginning teachers were changed from being confidential in nature to nonconfidential, there would be no measurable value change. Three objective measurements of the value of the recommendation were used: First, they were checked for the presence or absence of superlative statement; second, they were analyzed for the presence or absence of a qualifying statement; third, they were examined for a description of a critical incident. These criteria were selected on the basis of prior research evidence: (a) those recommendations were most predictive that contained more superlative adjectives; (b) that letters that are predictive of least success contain reservations or qualifying statements; and (c) that administrators are more inclined to give credence to letters of recommendation which actually describe examples of typical behavior or "critical incidents."

As an additional test of value, the letters were also submitted to a panel of judges who were asked to make subjective judgments of the letters. They were asked first to rate the subjects of the letters on the global variable of "promise as a teacher," and then to rate the recommendations themselves on the basis of helpfulness in evaluating the subject as a teacher.

The sample for this study included 1,000 letters collected from three college placement offices: California State College at Long Beach, California State College at Hayward, and Humboldt State College. The conditions surrounding the gathering of these recommendations were randomized so that no systematic bias could operate. Procedures were set up at Humboldt State College and California State College at Hayward which would require each candidate's file to contain approximately one-half confidential and one-half nonconfidential recommendations. This was accomplished by having the placement offices send out the recommendation blanks to the recommenders, one-half marked confidential and one-half marked nonconfidential. At California State College at Long Beach an alternate method was used in which every other file in June of 1967 was stamped confidential and the alternate files nonconfidential, and recommendations solicited on that basis.

Because only 1,000 recommendations were to be used, every second file was selected at Humboldt State College, every third file was selected at Hayward State College, and every fourth file was selected at Long Beach State College. The final sample included 509 confidential and 491 nonconfidential recommendations. These recommendations were coded and identifying material removed in an attempt to control rater bias.

FINDINGS

Superlatives

A superlative was defined as any statement that utilized a superlative form of an adjective or adverb or indicated a superior or outstanding class of behavior. Table 1 indicates the distribution of superlative statements from the confidential and nonconfidential recommendations.

TABLE 1.—PRESENCE OF A SUPERLATIVE STATEMENT

$\chi^2=2.80$ (NS).

Presence or absence of a qualifying statement

A qualifying statement was defined as any statement that suggested, intimated, or stated a weakness on the part of a candidate. An example of such a statement is, "She would make a good teacher, but first she must increase her understanding of students," or "He will become a competent teacher; however he will need more work in the area of lesson planning." Most authors were strong in their belief that with nonconfidential recommendations the incidence of statements of this type would decline.

December 19, 1974

Distribution of qualifying statements is indicated by Table 2.

Critical incidents

The critical incident for purposes of the study was defined as a description of an actual incident in the student teacher's preparation which was used by the recommender to illustrate a point or describe a trait or a characteristic of a candidate. An example of such an incident is a description of how a student teacher brought in materials over and above that required for the lesson plan, or how a student teacher successfully coped with a discipline problem. The actual incident itself was not the criterion, but the fact that the recommender wrote about it in the recommendation. The findings for this item are indicated in Table 3.

Judges' evaluations

The panel of judges, selected from California Educational Placement Association membership throughout the state, was asked first to rate the person described in the recommendation on the global basis of "promise as a teacher." Then the judges were asked to rate the same persons while forcing their ratings into a rectilinear distribution.

Each of the 14 judges received 48 recommendations equally divided between confidential and nonconfidential. The distribution within the subgroupings was random in nature, and none of the judges was aware of the conditions of distribution.

The distribution of the judges' ratings on the first question is indicated in Table 4, while the forced-choice distribution is indicated in Table 5.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The major findings in this study are:

- (1) There is no evidence that confidential recommendations contain a significantly different number of superlative statements.
- (2) There is no evidence that confidential recommendations contain a significantly different number of qualifying statements.
- (3) There is no evidence that confidential recommendations contain a statistically different number of statements which describe a critical incident.
- (4) There is no evidence that recommendations, when judged on the basis of that person's promise as a teacher, would be rated significantly different from nonconfidential recommendations.
- (5) There is no evidence that nonconfidential recommendations when rated on the basis of effectiveness in describing this person as a teacher would be rated significantly different from confidential recommendations.

CONCLUSIONS

Based upon the findings in this study, there is no basis for believing that nonconfidential recommendations will be less effective in describing potential promise of a teacher candidate. The data have not shown that confidential recommendations have fewer qualifying statements or fewer actual descriptions of critical incidents.

Teacher-education institutions should re-examine their historical position with respect to the confidentiality of teacher records and explore the possibility that open discussion of the perceptions of supervising teachers and other raters with the candidate may be more beneficial to the candidate.

HAIL TO THE CHAMPIONS—CENTRAL MICHIGAN UNIVERSITY

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, last weekend my alma mater, Central Michigan University, scored a stunning 54-14 victory in the nationally-televised Camellia Bowl game to win the small college national football championship.

As Coach Roy Kramer put it, this was a "dream come true" for CMU's football team, its student body and the alumni. All of Michigan is extremely proud of the Chippewas of Mt. Pleasant.

As an alumnus, I hope I may be pardoned for a little reminiscing and a few personal references. Back in the days when I went to Central, the college was small enough that you knew everyone on campus. In fact, there was an unwritten rule that you spoke to everyone you met on the way to class.

But the nicest thing that happened to me during my days at Central Michigan was that I got to know the pretty, petite valedictorian of the 1945 senior class. She was a lot smarter than I, but at least I had enough brains to marry her.

Mr. President, I salute the football team of CMU, the coaches, band, cheerleaders, student body, and the entire Mount Pleasant community for their performance and spirit last Saturday.

I ask unanimous consent that sincere newspaper accounts of the championship game be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)
Mr. GRIFFIN. The best man at our wedding was my roommate Ted Kjolhede, who just happens now to be the athletic director at Central Michigan University and a motivating force behind its 1974 national championship team.

I suppose my wife, Marge, and I feel much as Daniel Webster must have felt, when he argued a landmark case before the Supreme Court concerning his alma mater, Dartmouth College:

It is, sirs, a small college, and yet there are those who love it.

Times have changed, of course. Central, like most colleges, has grown. It has lost some of its earlier characteristics, but it has gained some new advantages—and it has gained widespread recognition, not only for prowess on the football field but in the academic world as well.

EXHIBIT 1

CMU TITLE "DREAM COME TRUE"
MOUNT PLEASANT.—A national championship football team arrives home today and it marks the first time since 1952 the state can hold such a welcome.

Within 16 seconds, the national television audience knew Central Michigan University was a team to be reckoned with.

Running back Dick Dunham took the handoff on the first Chippewa offensive play and raced 68 yards to paydirt, his first of four touchdowns in a game in which he gained 105 yards.

By the time the contest with the University of Delaware was finished, the Chippewas had won 54-14 and the national championship in the Division II of the NCAA.

"It was a dream come true," Central coach Ray Kramer said.

When the players return home later today at nearby Tri-City Airport from Sacramento, Calif., with their memories of victory in the Camellia Bowl, they are the first outright national champ from Michigan since 22 years ago when Michigan State University was voted No. 1 in both wire service polls.

It was also an especially 'Michigan' victory as the 75 players on Kramer's squad are Michigan natives.

The win was the 13th consecutive this season for the Chippewas since they lost the season opener to Kent State, 21-14.

Saturday's victory by the Chippewas also was the team's farewell to Division II status in the NCAA. Central now moves up to Division I, for schools that face tough opponents, and will be eligible for the Mid-American Conference title next year.

Central scored five of the first six times it had the ball against the Blue Hens in the first half and held a 16-0 lead at the end of the first quarter and a 30-8 intermission edge.

Quarterback Mike Frankowiak kicked his first field goal from 39 yards in the first quarter and tailback Walter "Smoke" Hodges got his first touchdown on a two-yard run with a pitchout before the second quarter began. For Hodges it was the 11th straight game in which he rushed for more than 100 yards. He got 112 yards in 27 carries, including his second score in the final quarter on a one-yard plunge.

December 19, 1974

Frankowiak hit Matt Means with an eight-yard pass for a seventh CMU touchdown and added a 27 yard field goal. Means ended the day with eight receptions for 146 yards.

Delaware, a team noted for good ball-handling, committed six turnovers in gaining their second loss in 15 games, and didn't get a score until the second quarter when quarterback Bill Zwann sneaked over from the one-yard line at 10:17 of the period. Zwann passed to halfback Vern Roberts for the two-point conversion.

With :21 left in the fourth quarter, Delaware scored again when halfback Herky Billings carried the ball over from five yards out.

FOOTBALL SUCCESS REFLECTS CHANGE AT CENTRAL MICH.

(By Bill Michelmore)

MT. PLEASANT.—The scene as you enter this town of 20,000 in the flat Michigan midlands is gloomy. The day is gray and the radio announcer is talking about fertilizer. But you press on, driving north on Business U.S. 27 and turning left at Preston Avenue. The object of the search: Central Michigan University.

You find it: Trees, attractive new buildings and streams of young people walking into the low-slung University Center with vitality and freshness—and a kind of old-fashioned wholesomeness that reminds you of a Van Johnson varsity movie in the 1950s.

"When I was a ballplayer and going to school at Central Michigan, people would ask, 'Where the hell is that?' Now they'll know," says Tom Tresh, 36, former major league ballplayer and now CMU's assistant director of placement. "Central hasn't seen a year like this ever before."

That is what has happened in the past couple of weeks—Central Michigan has become known.

The reason for the sudden fame is the university's football team, the Chippewas, who Saturday will play the biggest game in CMU history as they take on the University of Delaware in the NCAA Division II play-off at the Camellia Bowl in Sacramento, Calif. The game will be carried on national network television.

The underdog Chippewas won the berth in the Camellia Bowl by beating the number one rated small college team, Louisiana Tech, 35-14 Dec. 7 in the Pioneer Bowl in Wichita Falls, Tex. That game was televised to 25 states and a lot of Americans started talking about Central Michigan. Saturday, when the game goes on the air (2 p.m. ABC, Channel 7) millions of Americans will be watching. "Now," beams Kirk Squires, an 18-year-old CMU broadcasting major from Pontiac, "We can say, 'Look, we're on national TV, now ask us where we're from.'"

Yet, the school has nestled here for a long time—since 1892, in fact. And in the last decade it has grown rapidly as many Michigan parents, from the Detroit area and small outstate towns alike, sent their sons and daughters here, convinced they would receive a fine education.

The school has been traditionally committed to teaching and to the liberal arts. About 80 percent of the graduates come out of its fine School of Education, many going on to teach in Michigan elementary and secondary schools. The school also turns out many school administrators.

One of the most famous of its 40,000 alumni is U.S. Sen. Robert Griffin, R-Mich., who as assistant Republican leader in the U.S. Senate, is one of the most powerful congressional leaders in the country.

"We have always been a superior school academically and attracted good quality students," said ex-Detroit Tresh, who joined the University in 1971 after a well-known career with the New York Yankees and Detroit Tigers.

When he was studying at CMU on an athletic scholarship in the late 1950s there were 3,400 students. Today there are 14,500.

"It's a beautiful campus," says Tresh who wears cowboy boots and raises quarter horses on 72 acres not too far from the school. "It's just about the right size. Not too small anymore to be called hick and yet not so enormous that you lose quality teaching."

It was natural that as the quality of the students and faculty continued to flourish so, too, would the athletic program, specifically the football team.

But the big breakthrough for sports came in 1971 when the CMU Chippewas joined the Mid-American Conference, boosting the team to a high-quality league.

The big time had eluded CMU for years. The quality of education was often always there, but the enrollment was small and nothing was really happening.

"But about five or six years ago we had this tremendous breakthrough," recalls journalism chairman Dr. Gilbert Malenknecht. "Enrollment started burgeoning, things started moving. Something or someone had arrived."

Malenknecht and most other faculty members and students say that someone was Dr. William Beatty Boyd, who became the college's seventh president in 1968. Boyd, 51, a tall, softspoken Ivy Leaguer, joined CMU with an impressive academic background. He had been vice-chancellor at the University of California at Berkeley.

"I think Boyd just hit it right," says Malenknecht. "He sensed the tempo."

Boyd, who was born in another Mt. Pleasant, that one in South Carolina, is modest about what he has been able to do at Central.

"I think I just happened to be here when the changes became visible," he says. "It was a case of happy human dynamics."

Boyd, who came from Berkeley where "I always thought we (the college) was in a state of warfare with the town," calls this co-operation and rapport between Mt. Pleasant and CMU "remarkable."

This has never been more true now that the Chippewas have become national stars.

"The glory of the football team reflects on the whole town," says Boyd, "and the football team is a reflection of the quality of this university. . . . Now that the football team has called national attention to Central, the university will attract even more quality students."

The sad footnote to Boyd's role in shaping the burgeoning CMU is that he is leaving in September to become president of the University of Oregon. "I feel a really enormous sense of loss about leaving this university," he says.

The rapport between the town and the college that Boyd admires is obvious when you talk to people on and off campus.

"I have never been in a place before where there is such a community spirit towards the college," says Dr. Allan Quick, director of student teaching, who came here 11 years ago intending to stay about two years. "But I've found this to be such an exciting campus and such a nice town to live in I doubt if I'll ever leave."

Last Wednesday, about three dozen townspeople were down by fog-covered Perry Shorts Stadium, a new $2½-million structure that is a striking example of the physical growth of the college, boarding buses for the airport to go with the team to Sacramento.

"The community spirit in this town is fantastic," beamed one of them, John Walsh, executive director of the Chamber of Commerce. "All the talk downtown is about the game."

Last Saturday when CMU beat Louisiana just about everybody in town watched the game on television in large groups and they sang the fight song (Fight Central down the field/Fight for vic-tor-y) and there were a lot of partying going on.

Motorists blasted their horns and people were waving the school's maroon and gold colors.

"I was thinking as I rode through all that," says Kirk Squires, an 18-year-old student. "God, I'm just so happy to be at Central."

Still, there was something missing from last Saturday's game—the CMU Marching Chips band. They weren't down in Wichita Falls, Tex., to belt out the victory razzle-dazzle because there was no money to send them.

But this week the townspeople got together and raised $35,000 to send the 164 band members to Sacramento. Local bakers turned out 500 dozen doughnuts at $2 a dozen and many places in town like the bowling alleys turned in their receipts to the fund.

One resident, five-year-old Larry Grabinski, came into Walsh's office and dumped out the contents of his piggy bank. "Eighty cents," he said. "Go Chips, go."

CMU ROARS TO NCAA GRID TITLE, 54-14.—
DELAWARE NO MATCH FOR CHIPS

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.—Hail to the Chippewas!

Central Michigan University concluded its greatest season on the gridiron here Saturday by trampling over Delaware, 54-14, to win the Camellia Bowl for the NCAA College Division II championship.

Central's 13th straight victory was a copy of recent performances and maybe just a bit better.

Roy Kramer's club was powerful on offense as evidenced by its first play of the game when fullback Dick Dunham bolted for a 68-yard touchdown run.

Mike Frankowiak, 6-foot-3, 220-pound quarterback, led the offense by completing 11 of 13 passes for 186 yards and kicking field goals of 39 and 27 yards.

The defense intercepted four passes, including a pair by Flint's Ed Rykluski. Flint's Steve Bograkov, 6-1, 175-pound senior, recovered one fumble, had six tackles and was later named over-all defensive player of the game by the ABC crew which telecast the game nationally.

Frankowiak was picked the game's top offensive player.

Dunham tied an NCAA playoff record with four touchdowns and gained 121 yards in 16 carries. His plunges covered one, three and four yards.

Walter "Smoke" Hodges wound up with 112 yards in 26 attempts, marking the 11th straight game this season that Hodges has gained more than 100 yards.

"For them to go out and win this is something you think about, but it's like a dream come true," said a happy Kramer after the game. "Our game plan was to play it safe. We ran and we threw the ball in the first half to loosen them up and give Hodges some running room. The first play (by Dunham) was designed to feel them out. Fred Jacobson (CMU tackle) and Matt Means (end) threw some great blocks on that touchdown run."

Delaware, a team with a reputation for good ball handling, committed six turnovers, losing the ball also on two fumble recoveries.

December 19, 1974

The Blue Hens scored in the second and fourth periods.

Said Delaware Coach Harold "Tubby" Raymond after the game: "I think we left our best ball game in Baton Rouge. We turned it over quickly four times in the first half and we just couldn't control Central Michigan's offense."

The loss was the worst defeat for Delaware since 1933 and the most points scored against the Blue Hens since 1921.

The CMU defense smothered Delaware's shifting wing-T offense and put a hard rush on quarterback Bill Zwann throughout the game.

On the opening play from scrimmage, Dunham, 205-pound sophomore from Lansing, burst up the middle and lumbered untouched into the end zone, putting the Chippewas ahead to stay with 16 seconds gone.

A field goal by Frankowiak and a two-yard run by Hodges made it 16-0 after one quarter. Delaware, 12-2 mounted a long touchdown drive early in the second period, ending in a one-yard sneak by Zwann and a two-point conversion pass to Vern Roberts.

Central Michigan bounced right back with a 68-yard march capped by Dunham's second touchdown of the day. The key play in that drive was a 43-yard pass from Frankowiak to Means.

Means had an outstanding day of receiving, catching eight passes for 146 yards, all from Frankowiak.

Flint's Houston Tipton, a former Northwestern High star, and a recent addition to the CMU roster, also sparkled, recovering one fumble and running 33 yards with a pass interception.

A crowd of 14,137 watched what is expected to be the last championship game here in Hughes Stadium which is scheduled to be demolished as an earthquake hazard.

[From the Detroit News, Dec. 15, 1974]
DELAWARE ROUTED IN CAMELLIA BOWL—CMU ROMPS TO NATIONAL GRID TITLE

SACRAMENTO, Calif.—Athletic history will record that Central Michigan University's football team won the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) 1974 Division II national championship, but perhaps it should have been placed in another division.

It could have been called the "Super Division," because this season the Chippewas were truly a super football power, who performed in a class by themselves.

Their almost unbelievably dominant 54-14 massacre of the University of Delaware in Saturday's Camellia Bowl which gave it the national title was typical of the way Central whipped one team after another all season.

From the time fullback Dick Dunham raced 68 yards for Central's first touchdown with only 16 seconds elapsed in the game, it was not a question of whether Central would win but instead how badly it would beat the Blue Hens.

Quarterback Mike Frankowiak guided Central's offense flawlessly—picking Delaware apart with a superbly executed option attack, handing off to Dunham for bursts up the middle, and bull's-eye passes to split end Matt Means.

In addition, Frankowiak kicked two field goals, five extra points and did Central's punting and handled the kickoffs. He was voted the game's top offensive player.

Defensively, Central took the ball away from Delaware four times in the first half with two interceptions and two fumble recoveries and the Blue Hens never were in the game after scoring their only touchdown in the first quarter.

Central will take its national championship trophy back to its campus in Mt. Pleasant

Monday afternoon, giving the state of Michigan its first outright national football championship since 1952. That year Michigan State University was voted No. 1 in both wire service polls. In 1964, MSU finished first in one poll and Alabama was voted No. 1 in the other.

The University of Michigan won the Associated Press' national championship in 1948 when AP had the only poll.

Central is Michigan's only football team to win a national title on the field because the NCAA has a playoff system only for Divisions II and III. The system was begun last year, with Louisiana Tech winning the national title, but Division I was not included in the format.

And CMU's football squad really is a Michigan team, because all 75 players on Coach Roy Kramer's full roster are from Michigan.

Saturday's victory provided a fitting farewell to Division II status for Central, which moves up to Division I next season. Central, which became a member of the Mid-American Conference in 1971, will be eligible for the league championship next year.

Division I is what the NCAA considers University Division football and contain the country's major teams. Division II teams play smaller opponents and Division III teams are smaller still. Schools are placed in divisions according to the difficulty of their schedules, not the size of their institutions.

Central's only loss this year was a 21-14 defeat by MAC rival Kent State in its first game, and it won its last 13 games.

"To go out and win this is something that you think about," Kramer said after being carried off the field by his happy players. "It's like a dream come true."

Central got added inspiration before the game from a telephone call from defensive end Mark Bennett, who was in a hospital in Mt. Pleasant. Bennett's knee was injured in the Chippewas' 35-14 victory over Louisiana Tech in the Pioneer Bowl last Saturday.

"If you'd been in the locker room after Bennett talked to the team you'd have known they were going to play a good game," Kramer said.

It didn't take Central long to gain control of the game, with Dunham getting his first score on the long run on CMU's first play from scrimmage.

"The play was designed to feel them out," Kramer explained.

Instead, it knocked the Blue Hens out. Central scored five of the first six times it had the ball in the first half and held a 16-0 lead at the end of the first quarter and a 30-8 advantage at the intermission.

Frankowiak kicked his first field goal from 39 yards out in the first quarter and tailback Walter "Smoke" Hodges of Detroit Kettering High School got his first touchdown on a two-yard run with a pitchout before the first quarter ended.

Delaware took the ensuing kickoff and drove yards in 12 plays for its first touchdown with quarterback Bill Zwann getting the score on a sneak from the one. Zwann passed to back Vern Roberts for the two-point conversion to put Delaware in the game.

Central put Delaware out of the game quickly, however, as it took the kickoff and drove 68 yards with Dunham getting his second touchdown on a plunge from the one. Frankowiak's conversion gave Central a 23-8 lead.

Delaware fumbled the kickoff and Central recovered on the 34. In nine plays Central scored again with Dunham getting his third touchdown on a three-yard run up the middle. Frankowiak added the extra point and Central had a commanding 30-8 lead.

Whatever chance Delaware had ended in the third quarter when Frankowiak booted a 27-yard field goal and Dunham got his fourth score on a four-yard run. Central scored two more times in the fourth quarter, the first touchdown coming on Frankowiak's eight-yard pass to Means and the second on Hodges' one-yard run.

Delaware ended the scoring on Herky Billings' six-yard run late in the game.

Frankowiak had an impressive day, completing 11 of 13 passes for 186 yards. Means caught eight passes and picked up 146 yards.

Dunham had 121 yards in 16 carries and Hodges gained 112 in 12 rushes, giving him 11 consecutive games in which he has gained 100 or more yards. Dunham's four touchdowns tied an NCAA playoff record.

Central had 465 yards in total offense—279 rushing and 186 passing—while Delaware had 187 rushing and 167 passing for 354 yards. Delaware, which finished with a 12-2 record, qualified for the Camellia Bowl with a 49-11 victory over Nevada-Las Vegas in the Grantland Rice Bowl.

Central's defense had three pass interceptions, by Ed Rykluski, Joe Sierzenga and Houston Tipton, and Steve Bograkov and Benny Starns recovered fumbles. Central did not have a turnover.

Bograkov, a safety, was named the game's top defensive player.

Kramer, in his eighth season as Central's coach, couldn't resist a few smiles and back claps for his players when it was obvious late in the game that Central had the game wrapped up.

"I didn't feel it was in the bag until we got the 40th point," Kramer said.

The national title is in Central's bag now, headed back to Mt. Pleasant, where a super team produced a super season.

CENTRAL MICHIGAN OVERPOWERS DELAWARE—
MIGHTY CHIPS ARE BOWL CHAMPS, 55-14

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.—Fullback Dick Dunham bolted 68 yards for a touchdown on the game's first play and plunged for three more scores Saturday as Central Michigan buried Delaware, 54-14, in the Camellia Bowl for the NCAA Division II championship.

Dunham, a 205-pound sophomore, and quarterback Mike Frankowiak teamed to lead the Chippewas (12-1) to their 12th straight victory in the finals of the NCAA's eight-team playoffs.

Frankowiak, a second-team All-American, mixed option runs and pitches with deadly passing as the midwesterners, playing their last game in the college ranks, moved the ball at will. He completed 11 of 13 passes for 186 yards and one touchdown, and kicked field goals of 39 and 27 yards.

Dunham tied an NCAA playoff record with his four touchdowns and gained 121 yards in 16 carries. His plunges covered one, three and four yards.

On the opening play from scrimmage, he burst up the middle behind a block by center Wes Gamble and lumbered untouched into the end zone, putting the Chippewas ahead to stay with 16 seconds gone.

A field goal and a two-yard run by Walt Hodges made it 16-0 after one quarter. But Delaware (12-2) mounted a long touchdown drive early in the second period, ending in a one-yard sneak by Bill Zwann and a two-point conversion pass to Vern Roberts.

Central Michigan then put the game away with a 68-yard march that included a 43-yard pass from Frankowiak to split end Matt Means.

The Chips got a pre-game telephone call in the locker room from Mark Bennett, their injured defensive end, and coach Roy Kramer said: "We knew we were going to play a fine game after that. Bennett will get the game bill."

December 19, 1974

Bennett is confined to Gratiot Community Hospital in Alma after undergoing surgery on a knee. In the room with him were CMU president William Boyd and Mark's parents from Trenton.

"Certainly this was Mike Franckowiak's greatest game of the season," Kramer told reporters in the jubilant CMU dressing room. "We went to the pass in the first half to loosen them up and get some running room for Hodges. The first play of the game was just designed to feel them out, but (Fred) Jacobson's great block and Means' downfield block sent Dunham all the way," Kramer explained.

Hodges had a few comments about the turf and his rushing day. "The turf wasn't that good and I ran on my toes in the first half," he said. "The second half, I ran with my heels and had better traction. One of my goals is to get 100 yards rushing every game. Our backfield coach tells us that if we get 100 yards we're making a true contribution to the team."

The Chippewas intercepted three Zwaan passes and recovered two Delaware fumbles.

Hodges wound up with 112 yards in 27 carries, his 11th straight 100 yard plus game.

It was the worst defeat for Delaware since 1933 and the most points scored against the Blue Hens since 1921.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order tomorrow morning, the distinguished assistant Republican leader be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes; that the junior Senator from West Virginia be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes; that there then be transaction of routine morning business for not to exceed 15 minutes, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, in order that we may be clear as to procedure on tomorrow, I ask the Chair for clarification, particularly in light of a statement made by the acting majority leader that messages from the House are privileged matters.

It is my understanding that conference reports and messages from the House involving House amendments to Senate bills would be privileged, but that a House message on a House-passed bill only would not be a privileged matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is also my understanding that it would take a motion, which would be debatable, to bring up a House-passed bill at the desk—or by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would take unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Chair.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and at 11:20 p.m., the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, December 20, 1974, at 9 a.m.

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 302 Members have recorded their presence by electronic device, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, yesterday on rollcall No. 706 on the conference report on the bill H.R. 16596, the Special Employment Assistance Act of 1974, the RECORD shows that I voted "No." I intended to vote "aye." I would like the RECORD to show that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement will appear in the RECORD.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that the Chair will take personal requests, but not for speeches.

PROXY VOTING IN COMMITTEES SHOULD BE ELIMINATED

(Mr. COCHRAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, although this is my first term in the House, I have been distressed over a practice I have observed which in my opinion should be changed. We do not, nor should we, permit proxy voting on the floor of the House.

It is equally important, in my judgment, for each Member to cast his own vote in legislative committees. It is there that some of our most important votes are cast. It is an abrogation of our duty as elective Representatives to turn over our votes to committee bosses or others who are not answerable to the constituency entitled to those votes.

When we seek reform next year, let us begin by eliminating proxy voting in committees.

REGULATION OF MOVEMENT IN FOREIGN COMMERCE OF NOXIOUS WEEDS AND POTENTIAL CARRIERS THEREOF

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 11273) to provide for the regulation of the movement in foreign commerce of noxious weeds and potential carriers thereof, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Noxious Weed Act of 1974".

Sec. 2. The importation or distribution in interstate commerce of noxious weeds, except under controlled conditions, allows the growth and spread of such weeds which interfere with the growth of useful plants, clog waterways and interfere with navigation, cause disease, or have other adverse effects upon man or his environment and therefore is detrimental to the agriculture and commerce of the United States and to the public health. The uncontrolled distribution within the United States of noxious weeds after their importation or interstate distribution has like detrimental effects and allowing such distribution encourages and facilitates the burdening and obstructing of interstate and foreign commerce, and is inimical to the public interest. Accordingly, the Congress

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, December 19, 1974

The House met at 10 o'clock a.m.
The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour who is Christ the Lord.—Luke 2: 11.

Our Father, who hast declared Thy love to Thy children by the birth of the Holy Child at Bethlehem; help us to welcome Him with gladness and to make room for Him in all our hearts and in all our homes. Thus may we learn to live at peace with one another, in good will with all Thy family and continue to work for justice among the people on this planet. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Arrington, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 9598. An act for the relief of the city of Aransas Pass, Tex., and the Urban Renewal Agency of the city of Aransas Pass, Tex.;

H.R. 15229. An act to expand the authority of the Canal Zone government to settle claims not cognizable under the Tort Claims Act; and

H.R. 17655. An act to extend for 2 years the authorizations for the striking of medals in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the cable car in San Francisco and in commemoration of Jim Thorpe, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 17468) entitled "An act making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the House amendments to the Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4 to the foregoing bill.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 16596) entitled "An act to amend the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 to provide additional jobs hereby determines that the regulation of transactions in, and movement of, noxious weeds as provided in this Act is necessary to prevent and eliminate burdens upon and obstructions to interstate and foreign commerce and to protect the public welfare.

Sec. 3. As used in this Act, except where the context otherwise requires:

(a) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States or any other person to whom authority may be delegated to act in his stead.

(b) "Authorized Inspector" means any employee of the Department of Agriculture, or any employee of any other agency of the Federal Government or of any State or other governmental agency which is cooperating with the Department in administration of any provisions of this Act, who is authorized by the Secretary to perform assigned duties under this Act.

(c) "Noxious weed" means any living stage (including but not limited to, seeds and reproductive parts) of any parasitic or other plant of a kind, or subdivision of a kind, which is of foreign origin, is new to or not widely prevalent in the United States, and can directly or indirectly injure crops, other useful plants, livestock, or poultry or other interests of agriculture, including irrigation, or navigation or the fish or wildlife resources of the United States or the public health.

(d) "United States" means any of the States, territories, or districts of the United States.

(e) "Interstate" means from any State, territory, or district of the United States into or through any other State, territory, or district.

(f) "District" means the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any possession of the United States.

(g) "Move" means deposit for transmission in the mails, ship, offer for shipment, offer for entry, import, receive for transportation, carry, or otherwise transport or move, or allow to be moved, by mail or otherwise.

Sec. 4. (a) No person shall knowingly move any noxious weed, identified in a regulation promulgated by the Secretary, into or through the United States or interstate, unless such movement is authorized under general or specific permit from the Secretary and is made in accordance with such conditions as the Secretary may prescribe in the permit and in such regulations as he may promulgate under this Act to prevent the dissemination into the United States, or interstate, of such noxious weeds.

(b) The Secretary may refuse to issue a permit for the movement of any such noxious weed when, in his opinion, such movement would involve a danger of dissemination of such noxious weeds into the United States or interstate.

(c) No person shall knowingly sell, purchase, barter, exchange, give, or receive any such noxious weed which has been moved in violation of subsection (a), or knowingly deliver or receive for transportation or transport, in interstate or foreign commerce, any advertisement to sell, purchase, barter, exchange, give, or receive any such noxious weed which is prohibited from movement in such commerce under this Act.

Sec. 5. (a) The Secretary may promulgate such quarantines and other regulations requiring inspection of products and articles of any character whatsoever and means of conveyance, specified in the regulations, as a condition of their movement into or through the United States and otherwise restricting or prohibiting such movement, as he deems necessary to prevent the dissemination into the United States of any noxious weeds, and it shall be unlawful for any person to move any products, articles, or means of conveyance into or through the United States contrary to any such regulation.

(b) Whenever the Secretary has reason to believe that an infestation of noxious weeds exists in any State, territory, or district, he may by regulation temporarily quarantine such jurisdiction, or a portion thereof, and by regulation may restrict or prohibit the interstate movement from the quarantined area of any products and articles of any character whatsoever and means of conveyance, capable of carrying such noxious weeds, and after promulgation of such quarantine and other regulations, it shall be unlawful for any person to move interstate from a quarantined area any such products, articles, or means of conveyance, specified in the regulations, except in accordance with such regulations: Provided, however, That such quarantine and regulations shall expire at the close of the ninetieth day after their promulgation.

(c) However, if, after public hearing, the Secretary determines, on the basis of the information received at the hearing and other information available to him, that such a quarantine and regulations are necessary in order to prevent the interstate spread of noxious weeds from any State, territory, or district in which he determines an infestation of noxious weeds exists, and to protect the agriculture, commerce, fish, or wildlife resources of the United States or the public health, he shall promulgate such quarantine and other regulations as he determines are appropriate for such purposes, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any person to move interstate from any quarantined area any regulated products, articles, or means of conveyance except in accordance with such regulations.

Sec. 6. (a) Except as provided in paragraph (c) of this section, the Secretary may, whenever he deems it necessary as an emergency measure in order to prevent the dissemination of any noxious weed, seize, quarantine, treat, destroy, or otherwise dispose of, in such manner as he deems appropriate, any product or article of any character whatsoever, or means of conveyance, which is moving into or through the United States or interstate, in bond or otherwise, and which he has reason to believe is infested by any noxious weed or contains any such weed, or which has moved into the United States, or interstate, and which he has reason to believe was infested by or contained any noxious weed at the time of such movement; and any noxious weed, product, article, or means of conveyance which is moving into or through the United States, or interstate, or has moved into the United States, or interstate, in violation of this Act or any regulation hereunder.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, the Secretary may order the owner of any product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed subject to disposal under subsection (a) of this section, or his agent, to treat, destroy, or make other disposal of such product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed, without cost to the Federal Government and in such manner as the Secretary deems appropriate. The Secretary may apply to the United States District Court, or to the United States court of any territory or possession, for the judicial district in which such person resides or transacts business or in which the product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed is found, for enforcement of such order by injunction, mandatory or otherwise. Process in any such case may be served in any judicial district wherein the defendant resides or transacts business or may be found, and subpoenas for witnesses who are required to attend a court in any judicial district in such a case may run to any other judicial district.

(c) No product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed shall be destroyed, exported, or returned to shipping point of origin, or ordered to be destroyed, exported, or so returned under this section, unless in the opinion of the Secretary there is no less drastic action which would be adequate to prevent the dissemination of noxious weeds into the United States or interstate.

(d) The owner of any product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed destroyed, or otherwise disposed of, by the Secretary under this section, may bring an action against the United States in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, within one year after such destruction or disposal, and recover just compensation for such destruction or disposal of such product, article, means of conveyance, or noxious weed (not including compensation for loss due to delays incident to determining its eligibility for movement under this Act) if the owner establishes that such destruction or disposal was not authorized under this Act. Any judgment rendered in favor of such owner shall be paid out of the money in the Treasury appropriated for administration of this Act.

Sec. 7. Any authorized inspector, when properly identified, shall have authority (a) without a warrant, to stop any person or means of conveyance moving into the United States, and inspect any noxious weeds and any products and articles of any character whatsoever, carried thereby, and inspect such means of conveyance, to determine whether such person or means of conveyance is moving any noxious weed, product, article, or means of conveyance contrary to this Act or any regulation under this Act; (b) without a warrant, to stop any person or means of conveyance moving through the United States or interstate, and inspect any noxious weeds and any products and articles of any character whatsoever carried thereby, and inspect such means of conveyance, to determine whether such person or means of conveyance is moving any noxious weed, product, article, or means of conveyance contrary to this Act or any regulation thereunder; if such inspector has probable cause to believe that such person or means of conveyance is moving any noxious weed regulated under this Act; and (c) to enter, with a warrant, any premises in the United States, for purposes of any inspections or other actions necessary under this Act. Any judge of the United States or of a court of record of any State, territory, or district, or a United States commissioner, may, within his respective jurisdiction, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause to believe that there are on certain premises any products, articles, means of conveyance, or noxious weeds subject to this Act. Such warrants may be executed by any premises for purposes of any inspection or other action necessary under this Act, except as otherwise provided in section 9 of this Act. Such warrants may be executed by any authorized inspector or any United States marshal.

Sec. 8. Any person who knowingly violates section 4 or 5 of this Act, or any regulation promulgated under this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Sec. 9. (a) The Secretary is authorized to cooperate with other Federal agencies, agencies of States, territories, or districts, or political subdivisions thereof, farmers' associations, and similar organizations, and individuals in carrying out operations or measures in the United States to eradicate, suppress, control, or prevent or retard the spread of any noxious weed. The Secretary is authorized to appoint employees of other agencies of the Federal Government or any agencies of any State, territory, or district, or political subdivisions thereof, as collaborators to assist in administration of the provisions of this Act, pursuant to cooperative agreements with such agencies, whenever he determines that such appointments would facilitate administration of this Act.

(b) In performing the operations or measures authorized by subsection (a) of this section, the cooperating State or other governmental agency shall be responsible for the authority necessary to carry out the operations or measures on all lands and properties within the State or other jurisdiction involved, other than those owned or controlled by the United States Government, and for such other facilities and means as in the discretion of the Secretary are necessary.

Sec. 10. The Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations necessary to effectuate the provisions of this Act. However, any regulation identifying a noxious weed under section 4 of this Act shall be promulgated only after publication of a notice of the proposed regulation and, when requested by any interested person, a public hearing on the proposal. Any such regulation shall be based upon the information received at any such hearing and other information available to the Secretary and a determination by the Secretary that the plant is within the definition of a noxious weed in section 3(c) of this Act and that its dissemination in the United States may reasonably be expected to have, to a serious degree, any effect specified in section 3(c).

Sec. 11. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may from time to time determine to be necessary for the administration of this Act. Any sums so appropriated shall be available for expenditures for the purchase, hire, maintenance, operation, and exchange of aircraft and other means of conveyance, and for such other expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. However, unless specifically authorized in other legislation or provided for in appropriations, no part of such sums shall be used to pay the cost or value of property injured or destroyed under section 9 of this Act.

Sec. 12. The provisions of this Act shall not apply to shipments of seed subject to the Federal Seed Act (53 Stat. 1275, as amended; 7 U.S.C. 1551 et seq.) and this Act shall not amend or repeal any of the provisions of said Act or of the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912 (37 Stat. 315, as amended; 7 U.S.C. 151-154, 156-164a 167), the Federal Plant Pest Act (71 Stat. 31; 1 U.S.C. 150aa-150jjj), or any other Federal laws.

Sec. 13. The provisions of this Act shall not invalidate the provisions of the laws of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any territory or district of the United States relating to noxious weeds, except that no such jurisdiction may permit any action that is prohibited under this Act.

Sec. 14. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to provide for the control and eradication of noxious weeds, and the regulation of the movement in interstate or foreign commerce of noxious weeds and potential carriers thereof, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HEALTH MANPOWER ACT OF 1974— APPOINTMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 3585) to amend the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the programs of assistance under title VII for training in the health and allied health professions, to revise the National Health Service Corps program and the National Health Service Corps scholarship training program, and for other purposes, with a House amendment thereto, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. STAGGERS, ROGERS, SATTERFIELD, KYROS, PREYER, SYMINGTON, ROY, DEVINE, NELSEN, CARTER, HASTINGS, HEINZ, and HUDNUT.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON LIBRARY AND INFORMATION SERVICES

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 40) to authorize and request the President to call a White House Conference on Library and Information Services in 1976, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure I can preserve my right to raise a point of order against the nongermane Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect the gentleman.

The Clerk will report the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against section 3 of the conference report, that section which amends section 901(a) of the Education Amendments of 1972, on the basis that had this been offered as an amendment during the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 40 in the House, it would have been a nongermane amendment.

Under clause 4, rule XXVIII a motion can be offered to handle this matter separately. Thus I make a point of order that that section of the conference report is nongermane under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the conference report on page 17 there is an explanation, but on page 8 we will find we do have an exception there which states:

This section shall not apply to membership practices—(A) of a social fraternity or social sorority . . .

The SPEAKER. It is obvious to the Chair that section 3 of the conference report is not germane to the House amendment. The point of order is sustained. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) have a motion to reject the section?

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. I do have a motion to reject, Mr. Speaker.

MOTION TO STRIKE OFFERED BY MR. STEIGER OF WISCONSIN

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to strike.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin moves to strike section 3 of the conference report.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the hour is late, or early, depending on one's view and I regret exceedingly that it may take somewhat more time than otherwise would have been anticipated to discuss Senate joint resolution 40.

Mr. Speaker, section 3(a) of the conference report is known as the Bayh amendment and I ask that the Members look at the conference report, either as printed in the form that has been given to us, which is in error because the YWCA has been dropped out of this version, or that which is found on page 40547 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 17 which is, I understand, the correct version of the conference report. What this does, and I think the House ought to understand what it does, is to say that title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 shall not apply to social fraternities or social sororities, the active membership of which consists primarily of students in attendance at an institution of higher education, but it does apply to service organizations or fraternities.

What we are doing is establishing, for reasons that I do not comprehend, a dichotomy between a social fraternity and a service fraternity or a social sorority and a service sorority insofar as sex discrimination is concerned.

The section then goes on to exempt the—

YMCA, YWCA, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, and voluntary youth service organizations, which are so exempt—under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code—the membership of which has traditionally been limited to persons of one sex and principally persons of less than 19 years of age.

Now let us understand, the YMCA has a membership the majority of which is under 19 years of age. The YWCA has a membership approximately two-thirds over the age of 19; but both are to be exempt from the sex discrimination provisions of the Education Amendments of 1972, offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mrs. GREEN).

Thus, Mr. Speaker, two substantive problems arise with this language as we have it before us. No. 1, it establishes a unique and, in my judgment, very bad precedent in making a separation between social and service fraternities and sororities.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the state of the economy of the country and the terrific importance of this dialog, I think we ought to have a quorum here to hear it.

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. One hundred and eighty-two Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON LIBRARY INFORMATION SERVICES

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) is recognized.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman in the well yield?

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. There are questions I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin in regard to the section of the bill that he maintains is not germane.

Would he agree that this language is not as all-inclusive as was the language in the report on the appropriation bill in regard to Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, and all sororities and fraternities?

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is correct.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. There are many Members of the House who are concerned about HEW's proposed rules and regulations with respect to Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, YMCA, YWCA, Boys Club, Girls Club. There is also deep concern about proposed regulations requiring physical education classes and all other classes to be brought under the provisions of title IX. This title has been interpreted by some downtown as requiring all classes to be integrated on basis of sex.

We have a law now which must be sent to the Congress, and Congress has 45 days in which to review them and to reject them, if they wish.

The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. O'HARA) has told me this week, and I tried to find him on the floor, that he intends to have hearings next year as soon as possible on the proposed regulations from HEW which make no sense to the majority of the Members of this House, according to our previous votes.

Would the gentleman from Wisconsin agree that if we write this language into the law which is not all-inclusive and which does not cover all of our concerns, then it would be far more difficult to pass a resolution rejecting the proposed regulations on the basis that they are inconsistent with the law because of the very language to which the gentleman objects would seem to sanction the proposed regulations by its omission of certain groups.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. May I say to the gentleman that I think she has made exactly the point. If we adopt the amendment and do not reject the motion to strike this language, it is going to be hard ever coming back to HEW and saying, "What you are doing is wrong." The second fundamental reason, may I say to my colleagues and the gentleman from Oregon, is that title IX, as we passed it in our Education Amendments in 1972, provided that—

No person in the United States shall on the basis of sex be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

What the language does in this section of the conference report is to condone, in my judgment, the institutional approval which HEW is now attempting to do. They are saying we will regulate and even cut off Federal assistance to the whole of the institution, not just to a program or activity.

In interpreting title IX as an institutional eligibility statute HEW has generated controversy about everything from co-ed wrestling teams to regulation of the Girl Scouts, neither of which could possibly have been foreseen to be termed federally assisted programs. That kind of de facto recognition to the mistakes HEW is making by the adoption of this language is wrong.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I must say to my friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he will yield further—

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Absolutely.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin; it seems to me this section should be taken out.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the comments made by the gentleman from Oregon (Mrs. GREEN).

Mr. Speaker, I urge the rejection of this nongermane provision.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, if we do not vote down the Steiger motion, the status of fraternities and sororities and the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts and other voluntary youth service organizations will be uncertain.

It is true that the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) states that the amendment makes a distinction between social fraternities and sororities and service fraternities. The gentleman is correct. But in the conference we were restricted to dealing only with social fraternities. To also deal with service fraternities would have taken us beyond the scope of the conference.

In the new Congress in January we can deal with these other issues. Let us now do all we can by accepting what is in this conference report.

If we adopt the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) we will be doing a great disservice to these important national youth service organizations. We will be leaving them in a totally uncertain situation.

I should like to ask the Members to turn to the conference report on page 8, and to paragraph (B), where we expressly exempt the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, and Campfire Girls. Now, if the Members do not want to exempt these groups now, then they should vote for the Steiger motion.

Let me read from the statement of the manager on the Labor-HEW appropriation bill we considered a few weeks ago.

On page 17 of that conference report, the conferees stated:

We have received reports that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, is interpreting the provisions of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, Public Law 92-318, which prohibits sex discrimination in education, in such a manner as to apply these provisions to such organizations as the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, Boys' Clubs, Girls' Clubs, YMCA, YWCA, and sororities, fraternities and similar organizations.

The managers go on to say:

The conferees are agreed that this is an improper interpretation of the law and direct that none of the funds appropriated in this bill are to be used to enforce the provisions of title IX with respect to such organizations.

December 19, 1974

What we attempt to do in the conference report before us today is clarify that these organizations are exempt from title IX. The conference report goes as far as the rules of the House would permit. Let me say to my colleagues, if we want to go further next year we can. Hearings will be conducted. Nothing will be jeopardized in future deliberations. But at this time we should clarify the situation for the millions of people who constitute these youth organizations all over the country. I am concerned that if we fail to act today we will play into the hands of the HEW regulation writers. We should support the Committee on Appropriations with this statutory clarification that clearly exempts these organizations.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE).

Mr. QUIE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I know all of the Members have had letters from organizations like the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, fraternities, and sororities, stating that they feel it is wrong for HEW to prohibit them from using school facilities and that the language of title IX of Public Law 92-318 does not give this authority. Before the regulation becomes effective, we will have 45 days to review them and we will have a chance to reject them if we disapprove, which, I expect, we will do if they continue to insist on regulating such organizations.

However, the question before us today is. Do we want to make certain that the sororities, fraternities, Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, the YMCA, and the YWCA are exempt? Some are saying that if we exempt these organizations, we then in effect say to HEW it is all right to continue to prohibit others from using school grounds while we hold these groups hostage. I do not think we ought to hold them hostage. I think we ought to get as much as we can now, and if the Congress in its wisdom exempts these organizations, I expect that the Congress next year will exempt the others that then come to our attention.

In the 45-day review period the Congress only has to convince itself. It does not have to convince a jury; it only has to convince itself, and it is pretty well convinced now.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me say we went as far as we could possibly go within the rules of conference; am I correct?

Mr. QUIE. That is right. We would have gone further in the conference if we could have under the rule.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the Steiger motion will be voted down, so that we will not penalize these groups and keep them in this uncertain situation.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education says that we will have an opportunity to review portions of these so-called regulations next year when we have 45 days to do so. This House would only have that privilege if his committee submits a regulation; is that not true?

Mr. PERKINS. That is correct, and I believe we will submit such a resolution if HEW does not change its interpretation.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. All right. Now I would like to ask the distinguished chairman if at this stage he intends to bring to the floor of the House and to give this House the opportunity to further restrict HEW insofar as the physical education classes and service organizations are concerned.

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly do have that intention, but here we have something concrete which we can do today. None of us know what the future holds. If HEW does not change its view, I am sure that a resolution will be brought up in committee and I will urge the committee to go along with it.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield further, I do not want us next year to come in and find that we are being told, "Well, you have got this, and that is enough," because I and many Members of the House felt it is not enough—as I am sure the gentleman has heard not only myself, but from other Members of the House who are concerned about HEW going overboard on this idea of integration by sex of every operation from the ground up.

Mr. PERKINS. I know the gentleman is concerned. I know that is true, and that is the reason we are trying to deal with as much as we can possibly deal with in this conference. We have gone as far as the scope of the conference would permit us to go.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. And the gentleman will bring such a resolution to the floor of the House in the next session?

Mr. PERKINS. That is my intention as far as it is within my power to do it. If it is within my power to do it, I will.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, is it not true that any resolution that is to be brought to the floor rejecting the proposed regulations by HEW must be brought to the floor on the basis that it is inconsistent with the law?

Mr. PERKINS. I will not argue with the gentleman on that point. If I understand the situation, the gentleman was very active in the House Committee on Appropriations in pointing out that title IX was never intended to cover Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts and Campfire Girls and boys clubs and girls clubs, the YMCA, and the YWCA and many others. We are trying to clarify this in the law so that these exemptions will not be questioned. May I repeat we went as far as we could possibly go in conference.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. My question was: Is it not true that we cannot bring a resolution to the floor rejecting proposed regulations unless the regulations are inconsistent with the law? Now we put this into the law and then we will have far more difficulty rejecting their proposed regulations.

Mr. PERKINS. I disagree with the gentleman because a resolution or a bill can be brought to this floor on any subject—to change any law. Here we have the conference agreement clarifying certain exemptions, and a plea with this Chamber not to continue the uncertainty about these exemptions because none of us knows what the future holds. We want this clarified as soon as possible and this will clear up much of it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman 100 percent. I think one of the areas of negligence in this body is that we always wait for somebody else to correct our errors. If we straighten it out in the conference, the regulations can be straightened out, but here we have a chance to take a correcting action against the improper interpretation of the law. I think we should take this action today and let the future take care of itself.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I know the chairman did not have a copy of the act in front of him and I think we should say we would only bring back a resolution disapproving the regulations if they are inconsistent with the law. To that extent the gentleman from Oregon is correct.

The question is: If we put this in the law at this time, does that make the rest of HEW's regulations inconsistent with the law? I say that what they have done is inconsistent and we can bring a resolution of disapproval to the floor, because the law says, and the mandate of the law is clear:

No person in the United States, shall on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

Concerning these other organizations in which the gentleman from Texas is interested, as the service fraternities, we have included social service fraternities in the report and we expect they will be exempted. We do not know for certain because we are dependent on HEW's interpretations, but we will, I believe, have the grounds even if we adopt the report to disapprove of what they send up to us if they attempt to include other organizations, and we find this inclusion to be inconsistent with the law. And we can bring that resolution back to the House, for who is it that decides whether we can disapprove or not? We decide that ourselves. We do not go to a jury. The gentleman says the regulations are inconsistent with the law. I say they are inconsistent with the law. If our colleagues on the committee agree it is inconsistent with the law, we can bring back that resolution to the House.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER).

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and particularly to speak out of order for 1 minute.

I indicated this morning that we have the Project Survival, which was an effort for Members to include food for the needy in Washington on the steps of the Capitol at 11:45 today. I have spoken to the Speaker. We are going to go ahead with this. If the Members that have food or members of their staff, we would appreciate their contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge everyone to support this conference report, because it certainly answers a need at this time and sends us in the direction we ought to be going.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. CASEY).

Mr. CASEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the colloquy with the gentlemen from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE): If it is determined that a resolution of disapproval is necessary to bring about the result we desire, will the chairman exert his efforts to bring forth a simple amendment to title IX, bring it up under suspension. This House would pass it in 40 minutes, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I certainly will, because I would like to go along with the exceptions within the scope of the conference.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. I do not want to be too harsh about it.

Mr. Speaker, we have had similar problems before, where if the committee had brought out a simple amendment, they did not need to bring out a comprehensive bill. If they will just pick out the things that are giving so much trouble and bring a simple amendment and let us pass it and say that this is the law, that is all that is necessary.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me say that I will work with the gentleman from Texas (Mr. CASEY) next year.

Mr. CASEY of Texas. That is the best way to handle it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) should be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to strike section 3, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin) there were—yeas 37, nays 102.

So the motion to strike was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of December 17, 1974.)

Mr. PERKINS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the statement be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the conference report before us contains three important sections: First, authorizing a White House Conference on Library and Information Services; second, a series of amendments to the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974; and third, as we have discussed, an amendment to title IX of the Higher Education Act of 1972 which prohibits discrimination in education on the basis of sex.

The provisions of the conference report authorizing the White House Conference on Library and Information Services are identical to the House-passed version of this legislation, with two exceptions.

As passed by the House, $3,000,000 was authorized to be appropriated for the Conference. The Senate version authorized $10,000,000. The conference report authorizes $3,500,000.

In the House version the Conference is to be held in 1977, while in the Senate version the Conference is to be held in 1978. The conference agreement provides that the Conference shall be held not later than 1978.

The second section of the conference report concerns the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974, commonly known as the "Buckley amendment." That amendment gives parents, students 18 years of age and older, and students attending postsecondary institutions the right to inspect their education records and the right to challenge those records. The Buckley amendment also restricts the access of third parties to these records.

In brief, the Senate in its version of the White House conference bill proposed to make a number of changes in the provisions of the Buckley amendment. These changes were designed principally to meet objections voiced by the higher education community.

The major modifications which we adopted to the Buckley amendment in conference are the following:

First. College students are not given the right to inspect the financial records of their parents;

Second. Confidential letters of recommendation placed in college education records prior to January 1, 1975, are not subject to student inspection;

Third. State and local officials will continue to have access to information specifically required to be reported to them pursuant to State law in effect on November 19, 1974; and Fourth. Parents of dependent college students are guaranteed the right to receive information on their children from the colleges.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these amendments meet the principal concerns of the higher education community and their adoption will make the Buckley amendment more workable in its implementation.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to elaborate further on the Buckley amendment.

The Buckley amendment was adopted as part of the Education Amendments of 1974, Public Law 93-380. As I stated, after its adoption a number of complaints arose concerning its implementation, especially complaints from the higher education community. The purpose of the changes which we have adopted in this bill is to correct certain deficiencies in the Buckley amendment which have been pointed out during the last several months.

These amendments originated in the Senate version of this bill. The House version of Senate Joint Resolution 40 contained no amendments to Buckley. The Senate proposed to change the Buckley amendment by—

First. Clarifying the definition of the education records involved.

Second. Clarifying that previously enrolled students have the same rights as presently enrolled students.

Third. Exempting parents' financial records and confidential letters of recommendation placed in education records prior to January 1, 1975, from the coverage of this amendment;

Fourth. Providing that students can waive this right of access to certain confidential recommendations;

Fifth. Permitting parents to insert an explanatory statement into the education records;

Sixth. Exempting personal notes of education staff and physical and mental health records from the coverage of the amendment;

Seventh. Setting up a procedure for the publication of generalized directory information on students;

Eighth. Exempting from the amendment information which must be reported to State and local officials pursuant to State law and information used by education organizations administering tests and by accrediting organizations;

Ninth. Giving parents of dependent students the right to receive information on their children;

Tenth. Creating an exemption for emergencies;

Eleventh. Requiring that a list of third parties given access to education records be maintained; and Twelfth. Forbidding regionalization by HEW of the administration of the amendment, except for the conduct of hearings in regional offices.

The House conferees adopted these amendments with the following modifications:

First. Institutions are prohibited from requiring a student to waive his right to inspect records as a condition of his admission to such institution;

Second. State and local officials will continue to have access to information specifically required to be reported to them pursuant to State law in effect on November 19, 1974;

December 19, 1974

Third. The exemption for testing organizations is clarified; and Fourth. Longitudinal studies are permitted under certain conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make several additional points for the purpose of legislative history.

The first point concerns the amendment to section 438(b)(1) dealing with the new exemption for organizations of educational agencies involved with predictive tests. This amendment permits such organizations to use personally identifiable information under two conditions: first, that only employees of such organizations have such information available to them; and second, that such information be destroyed when it has served its purpose. It is the intention of the conferees that social security numbers not be used in any way by organizations using this exemption.

Similarly, in the exemption for authorized representatives of the Comptroller General, the Secretary of HEW, administrative heads of education agencies, and State educational authorities conducting audits and evaluations and implementing Federal legal requirements, it is the intention of the conferees that social security numbers also not be used.

In redrafting the subsection dealing with this exemption to third party accessibility, the phrase "including social security numbers" was deleted purely on the basis of superfluity. It is not the intention of the conferees to permit the use of such social security numbers in these situations.

Mr. Speaker, the last point I would like to make concerns the situation in several States where the State legislature has provided funds for statewide testing in the school districts of the State and where the State education agency serves as the intermediary for the collection of these tests and their transmission to a national testing organization for processing and evaluation. The State of Georgia, for instance, has followed this procedure for the past several years. It is clearly our intention to permit this practice to continue provided, however, that any personally identifiable information be available only to officials of the State education agency and to employees of the organization processing this information and provided that the personally identifiable information be destroyed when it has served its purpose.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the conference report amends title IX of the Higher Education Act of 1972 which prohibits discrimination in education on the basis of sex. As my colleagues know, there have been a number of concerns with respect to the application of title IX to fraternities and sororities and such organizations as Boy Scouts and other voluntary youth organizations.

The amendment in the conference report exempts the membership practices of social fraternities and sororities and voluntary youth service organizations such as the YMCA, the YWCA, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Campfire Girls from the application of title IX. This is consistent with a direction in the manager's statement on the Labor-HEW appropriations bill that no appropriated funds be used to enforce the provisions of title IX with respect to social fraternities and sororities and these youth service organizations.

Mr. Speaker, this is obviously an important and necessary piece of legislation, and I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the author of the House bill (Mr. BRADEMAs).

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding to me. Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good conference report touching on three important matters. I hope very much it will have the support of Members on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he took the White House library bill to conference and made a Christmas tree out of it?

Mr. PERKINS. No, we did not, I say to the gentleman from Iowa. We did increase the authorization for the White House Conference from $3 million to $3,500,000. The authorization in the Senate bill was $10 million. We insisted that figure be reduced. We finally agreed on $3,500,000.

Mr. GROSS. I understand, but I am talking about the many items that were not in the bill when it passed in the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That is correct, but these are important and necessary Senate additions.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Kentucky has indicated in his colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS) there are two provisions added to this bill which were not in the House bill. They were added by the Senate, and are of such importance that we did feel it important to accept them. The first were the amendments to the Buckley amendment in H.R. 69 dealing with privacy of student records. The second were the changes to title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 dealing with sex discrimination.

We have talked a great deal already this morning about the title IX amendments. Let me just recap a bit about title IX.

Tuesday evening the conferees, appointed to resolve the House-Senate differences on the White House Library Conference bill, came to agreement on a modified version of the Bayh amendment dealing with title IX sex discrimination regulations. Because the subject was not in the House bill the conferees such as the YMCA, the YWCA, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Campfire Girls from the application of title IX. This is consistent with a direction in the manager's statement on the Labor-HEW appropriations bill that no appropriated funds be used to enforce the provisions of title IX with respect to social fraternities and sororities and these youth service organizations.

Mr. Speaker, this is obviously an important and necessary piece of legislation, and I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the author of the House bill (Mr. BRADEMAs).

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding to me.

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good conference report touching on three important matters. I hope very much it will have the support of Members on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he took the White House library bill to conference and made a Christmas tree out of it?

Mr. PERKINS. No, we did not, I say to the gentleman from Iowa. We did increase the authorization for the White House Conference from $3 million to $3,500,000. The authorization in the Senate bill was $10 million. We insisted that figure be reduced. We finally agreed on $3,500,000.

Mr. GROSS. I understand, but I am talking about the many items that were not in the bill when it passed in the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That is correct, but these are important and necessary Senate additions.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Kentucky has indicated in his colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS) there are two provisions added to this bill which were not in the House bill. They were added by the Senate, and are of such importance that we did feel it important to accept them. The first were the amendments to the Buckley amendment in H.R. 69 dealing with privacy of student records. The second were the changes to title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 dealing with sex discrimination.

We have talked a great deal already this morning about the title IX amendments. Let me just recap a bit about title IX.

Tuesday evening the conferees, appointed to resolve the House-Senate differences on the White House Library Conference bill, came to agreement on a modified version of the Bayh amendment dealing with title IX sex discrimination regulations. Because the subject was not in the House bill the conferees were forced to work within the limited scope of the Bayh amendment, we were not able to address ourselves to the overall issues and problems presented by title IX.

On July 1, 1972, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 became effective. The mandate of the law was clear:

No person in the United States, shall on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

Yet, when on June 18, 1974, the Secretary of HEW published the proposed regulations to implement title IX, we were presented with regulations which went far beyond federally assisted programs, touching every activity in an educational institution and every program and activity beyond the institution itself conducted in the academic community. Consequently, we now are faced with an attempt by HEW to regulate the membership practices of organizations which do not receive Federal funds and which merely use school facilities for meetings, social events and student benefit programs.

The title IX regulations as written extend to such groups as social honorary and service fraternities and sororities, mortarboard, and key clubs, all of which are traditionally single sex and which usually have male and female counterparts on the same campus. Further, the regulations prevent an educational institution from providing any service more than the occasional loan of a room to such groups as the American Association of University Women, the American League of Women Voters, Rotary, Lions, and Kiwanis. Is it possible that when Congress exempted from title IX the admissions practices of traditionally single sex public institutions of higher education, that at the same time it intended to force open the membership of the single sex organizations which serve such institutions? In some instances, in small towns for example, the local campus is the only place for these organizations to meet, have functions, conduct youth projects and athletic activities. Is Congress saying that assisting these organizations in some minute way will so taint the institutions that their eligibility for Federal funds will be affected? What about community colleges which thrive on the intermingling of academic and community contacts? Will they be denied Federal funds?

With regard to the agreement reached by the conferees, although we have been successful in exempting from regulation the membership practices of social fraternities and sororities, which I hope would be interpreted to mean honorary and service as well—the YMCA and YWCA, Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, and the Campfire Girls, we have neither touched nor even addressed ourselves to the problems of similar youth and adult service organizations. The restrictions placed upon the conferees by the Bayh amendment severely limited our consideration at this time, but the new Congress must and shall deal thoroughly and effectively with the greater issues and problems presented by title IX. I support the conference report and will work to further correct HEW's mistakes and the law's vagueness next year.

Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased that included in this conference report are several major changes in the Buckley amendment dealing with student and parent rights to school records which should serve to clarify the confusion which had surrounded adoption of the Family Rights and Privacy Act in August as a section of the Education Amendments of 1974, Public Law 93-380.

With the adoption of these refinements, schools, colleges, and other educational institutions will now be better prepared to move ahead in implementing the act. I expect that our committee will carefully watch the experiences of both students and institutions as they operate under this section of Federal law, and we should hold hearings on the implementation of the law in the next Congress. I wish to express my thanks to those individuals and groups who have worked to develop perfecting amendments.

For the assistance of those interested in knowing exactly what the Federal law will be regarding student records, assuming Presidential signature of Senate Joint Resolution 40, I am inserting at the conclusion of these remarks the text of section 438 as amended by this joint resolution.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS AND PRIVACY OF PARENTS AND STUDENTS
(As amended by S.J. Res. 40)

Sec. 438. (a) (1) No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any educational agency or institution which has a policy of denying, or which effectively prevents, the parents of students who are or have been in attendance at a school of such agency or at such institution, as the case may be, the right to inspect and review the education records of their children. If any material or document in the education record of a student includes information on more than one student, the parents of one of such students shall have the right to inspect and review only such part of such material or document as relates to such student or to be informed of the specific information contained in such part of such material. Each educational agency or institution shall establish appropriate procedures for the granting of a request by parents for access to the education records of their children within a reasonable period of time, but in no case more than forty-five days after the request has been made.

(B) The first sentence of subparagraph (A) shall not operate to make available to students in institutions of postsecondary education the following materials:

(i) financial records of the parents of the student or any information contained therein;

(ii) confidential letters and statements of recommendation, which were placed in the education records prior to January 1, 1975, if such letters or statements are not used for purposes other than those for which they were specifically intended;

(iii) if the student has signed a waiver of the student's right of access under this subsection in accordance with subparagraph (C), confidential recommendations—

(i) respecting admission to any educational agency or institution,

(ii) respecting an application for employment, and

(iii) respecting the receipt of an honor or honorary recognition.

(C) A student or a person applying for admission may waive his right of access to confidential statements described in clause (iii) of subparagraph (B), except that such waiver shall apply to recommendations only if (i) the student is, upon request, notified of the names of all persons making confidential recommendations and (ii) in the case of recommendations described in such clause are used solely for the purpose for which they were specifically intended. Such waivers may not be required as a condition for admission to, receipt of financial aid from, or receipt of any other services or benefits from such agency or institution.

(2) No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any educational agency or institution unless the parents of students who are or have been in attendance at a school of such agency or at such institution are provided an opportunity for a hearing by such agency or institution, in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary, to challenge the content of such student's education records, in order to insure that the records are not inaccurate, misleading, or otherwise in violation of the privacy or other rights of students, and to provide an opportunity for the correction or deletion of any such inaccurate, misleading, or otherwise inappropriate data contained therein and to insert into such records a written explanation of the parents respecting the content of such records.

(3) For the purposes of this section the term "educational agency or institution" means any public or private agency or institution which is the recipient of funds under any applicable program.

(4) (A) For the purposes of this section, the term "education records" means, except as may be provided otherwise in subparagraph (B), those records, files, documents, and other materials which—

(i) contain information directly related to a student; and

(ii) are maintained by an educational agency or institution, or by a person acting for such agency or institution.

(B) The term "education records" does not include—

(i) records of instructional, supervisory, and administrative personnel and educational personnel ancillary thereto which are in the sole possession of the maker thereof and which are not accessible or revealed to any other person except a substitute;

(ii) if the personnel of a law enforcement unit do not have access to education records under subsection (b) (1), the records and documents of such law enforcement unit which (i) are kept apart from records described in subparagraph (A), (ii) are maintained solely for law enforcement purposes, and (iii) are not made available to persons other than law enforcement officials of the same jurisdiction;

(iii) in the case of persons who are employed by an educational agency or institution but who are not in attendance at such agency or institution, records made and maintained in the normal course of business which relate exclusively to such person in that person's capacity as an employee and are not available for the use for any other purpose; or

(iv) records on a student who is eighteen years of age or older, or is attending an institution of postsecondary education, which are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or para-professional acting in his professional or para-professional capacity, or assisting that capacity, and which are made, maintained, or used only in connection with the provision of treatment to the student, and are not available to anyone other than persons providing such treatment except, that such records can be personally reviewed by a physician or other appropriate professional of the student's choice.

(5) (A) For the purposes of this section the term "directory information" relating to a student includes the following: the student's name, address, telephone listing, date and place of birth, major field of study, participation in officially recognized activities and sports, weight and height of members of athletic teams, dates of attendance, degrees and awards received, and the most recent previous educational agency or institution attended by the student.

(B) Any educational agency or institution making public directory information shall give public notice of the categories of information which it has designated as such information with respect to each student attending the institution or agency and shall allow a reasonable period of time after such notice has been given for a parent to inform the institution or agency that any or all of the information designated should not be released without the parent's prior consent.

(6) For the purposes of this section, the term "student" includes any person with respect to whom an educational agency or institution maintains education records or personally identifiable information, but does not include a person who has not been in attendance at such agency or institution.

(b) (1) No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any educational agency or institution which has a policy or practice of permitting the release of education records (or personally identifiable information contained therein other than directory information, as defined in paragraph (5) of subsection (a)) of students without the written consent of their parents to any individual, agency, or organization, other than to the following—

(A) other school officials, including teachers within the educational institution or local educational agency who have been determined by such agency or institution to have legitimate educational interests;

(B) officials of other schools or school systems in which the student seeks or, intends to enroll, upon condition that the student's parents be notified of the transfer, receive a copy of the record if desired, and have an opportunity for a hearing to challenge the content of the record;

(C) authorized representatives of (i) the Comptroller General of the United States, head of an education agency (as defined in (ii) the Secretary, (iii) an administrative head of an education agency (as defined in section 408(c) of this Act), or (iv) State educational authorities, under the conditions set forth in paragraph (3) of this subsection; and

(D) in connection with a student's application for, or receipt of, financial aid;

(E) State and local officials or authorities to which such information is specifically required to be reported or disclosed pursuant to State statute adopted prior to November 19, 1974;

(F) organizations conducting studies for, or on behalf of, educational agencies or institutions for the purpose of developing, validating, or administering predictive tests, improving instruction, if such studies are conducted in such a manner as will not permit the personal identification of students and their parents by persons other than representatives of such organizations and such information will be destroyed when no longer needed for the purpose for which it is conducted;

(G) accrediting organizations in order to carry out their accrediting functions;

(H) parents of a dependent student of such parents, as defined in section 152 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; and

(I) subject to regulations of the Secretary in connection with an emergency, appropriate persons if the knowledge of such information is necessary to protect the health or safety of the student or other persons.

December 19, 1974

Nothing in clause (E) of this paragraph shall prevent a State from further limiting the number or type of State or local officials who will continue to have access thereunder.

(2) No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any educational agency or institution which has a policy or practice of releasing, or providing access to, any personally identifiable information in education records other than directory information, or as is permitted under paragraph (1) of this subsection unless—

(A) there is written consent from the student's parents specifying records to be released, the reasons for such release, and to whom, and with a copy of the records to be released to the student's parents and the student if desired by the parents; or

(B) such information is furnished in compliance with judicial order, or pursuant to any lawfully issued subpoena, upon condition that parents and the students are notified of all such orders or subpoenas in advance of the compliance therewith by the educational institution or agency.

(3) Nothing contained in this section shall preclude authorized representatives of (A) the Comptroller General of the United States, (B) the Secretary, (C) an administrative head of an education agency or (D) State educational authorities from having access to student or other records which may be necessary in connection with the audit and evaluation of Federally supported education programs, or in connection with the enforcement of the Federal legal requirements that relate to such programs: Provided, That except when collection of personally identifiable information is specifically authorized by Federal law, any data collected by such officials shall be protected in a manner which will not permit the personal identification of students and their parents by other than those officials, and such personally identifiable data shall be destroyed when no longer needed for such audit, evaluation, and enforcement of Federal legal requirements.

(4) (A) Each educational agency or institution shall maintain a record, kept with the education records of each student, which will indicate all individuals (other than those specified in paragraph (1) (A) of this subsection), agencies, or organizations which have requested or obtained access to a student's education records maintained by such educational agency or institution, and which will indicate specifically the legitimate interest that each such person, agency, or organization has in obtaining this information. Such record of access shall be available only to parents, to the school official and his assistants who are responsible for the custody of such records, and to persons or organizations authorized in, and under the conditions of, clauses (A) and (C) of paragraph (1) as a means of auditing the operation of the system.

(B) With respect to this subsection, personal information shall only be transferred to a third party on the condition that such party will not permit any other party to have access to such information without the written consent of the parents of the student.

(C) The Secretary shall adopt appropriate regulations to protect the rights of privacy of students and their families in connection with any surveys or data-gathering activities conducted, assisted, or authorized by the Secretary or an administrative head of an education agency. Regulations established under this subsection shall include provisions controlling the use, dissemination, and protection of such data. No survey or data-gathering activities shall be conducted by the Secretary, or an administrative head of an education of an education agency under an applicable program, unless such activities are authorized by law.

(d) For the purpose of this section, whenever a student has attained eighteen years of age, or is attending an institution of postsecondary education the permission or consent required or and the rights accorded to the parents of the student shall thereafter only be required of and accorded to the student.

(e) No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any educational agency or institution unless such agency or institution informs the parents of students, or the students, if they are eighteen years of age or older, or are attending an institution of postsecondary education, of the rights accorded them by this section.

(f) The Secretary, or an administrative head of an education agency, shall take appropriate actions to enforce provisions of this section and to deal with violations of this section, according to the provisions of this Act, except that action to terminate assistance may be taken only if the Secretary finds there has been a failure to comply with the provisions of this section, and he has determined that compliance cannot be secured by voluntary means.

(g) The Secretary shall establish or designate an office and review board within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for the purpose of investigating, processing, reviewing, and adjudicating violations of the provisions of this section and complaints which may be filed concerning alleged violations of this section. Except for the conduct of hearings, none of the functions of the Secretary under this section shall be carried out in any of the regional offices of such Department.

I think all of these amendments are good and necessary. I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to direct a question to the gentleman on the Committee on Education and Labor, on the Buckley amendment.

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for a question to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

When defining "educational record," that is, materials which are to be held in confidence, unless prior approval is obtained for release, the conferees have excluded: "records of instructional, supervisory, and administrative personnel ancillary thereto which are in the sole possession of the maker thereof and which are not accessible or revealed to any other person except a substitute;"

I presume this is to be narrowly construed so that only those materials used solely by the person preparing them, or an appropriate substitute, are exempt. Is my interpretation correct?

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's interpretation is correct.

This is a very narrow exclusion to cover materials such as an instructor's notes to himself, and the like, not, for example, an instructor's notes to someone else.

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman and I thank the chairman.

Mr. BRADEMANS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 40, authorizing a White House Conference on Library and Information Services and for other purposes, and urge my colleagues to join in approving it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, Mr. PERKINS, as well as the gentleman from Minnesota, the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. QUIE, and I have labored diligently to see that the conference report closely mirrors the House-passed bill.

My colleagues will recall that on December 12, the House gave overwhelming approval to Senate Joint Resolution 40 by a vote of 258 to 81, with one Member voting present. The conference report retains most of the major House provisions.

The House-passed bill, for example, authorized $3 million for the White House conference, while the Senate provided for $10 million. The conference report authorizes $3.5 million.

The Senate bill provided that the conference be composed of members of the general public, and the House included public officials as well. The Senate has receded to the House on these provisions, and has receded, also, on the provisions relating to the composition of the Advisory Committee of the White House Conference.

Mr. Speaker, let me point out that the House bill provided for holding the conference in 1977 with 1978 in the Senate-passed bill. Because the House date is only 1 year away, the conferees agreed that the White House conference should be held no later than 1978.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to just note that the Senate has receded to the House provisions requiring that the printing of documents from the conference, and related work such as binding, be carried out by the Government Printing Office.

Mr. Speaker, the conference report contains two Senate amendments not included in the original legislation approved by the House.

One of the Senate amendments provides an exemption from the sex discrimination provisions of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 for youth service organizations such as the Girl Scouts and Boy Scouts. The same exemption is also provided to college fraternities and sororities. None of these organizations was intended by Congress to be included within the coverage of title IX, and the amendment makes clear to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare that they are not to be treated as if they were included.

I am happy to add, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment was offered by my distinguished colleague and friend, the junior Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), whose dedication to the concept of equal opportunity is second to none in the Congress.

The second Senate amendment is intended to clear up various ambiguities and errors in the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act, the so-called "Buckley Amendment" to the Education Amendments of 1974.

I am compelled to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not entirely convinced that the amendments to the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act contained in this report are sufficient to remedy all of the anomalies which may arise under that legislation. The original act was added as a floor amendment during Senate consideration of the elementary and secondary education bill earlier this year and, like the amendment contained in this report, has never been the subject of hearings or committee consideration in either body.

Since the original measure was signed into law, the act has had a number of effects not contemplated by its sponsors, particularly in its application to institutions of postsecondary education.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that hearings in both bodies will be held in the new Congress to consider any additional problems not resolved by the amendments contained in the report considered today.

Mr. Speaker, to return to the original purpose of Senate Joint Resolution 40, the White House Conference on Library and Information Services it authorizes can prove to be of enormous importance to the future directions of libraries and information science in our society.

I urge my colleagues to support this conference report.

I want also to include in the RECORD an editorial on the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act from this morning's Washington Post.

The editorial makes the point that while the objectives of the act are clearly laudable, this is a matter "more complicated than it first appeared." The editorial follows:

SECOND THOUGHTS ABOUT SCHOOL RECORDS

SEN. JAMES L. BUCKLEY (R-Cons.-N.Y.) has found out recently that opening up school records is more complicated than it first appeared. The senator's original proposal, approved in modified form as a floor amendment to this year's big education bill, limits the uses of school records about individual students and gives parents—and students themselves, if they are 18 years of age or in college—the right to inspect and correct those files. When many educators belatedly focused on the law, they found much which they said was vague or objectionable, and some universities even took steps to make some files unavailable for student review. In response to such opposition, Sen. Buckley and Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.), chairman of the Senate education subcommittee, fashioned another floor amendment which has been tacked onto a minor libraries bill. If President Ford signs the bill, an important due-process law will have been enacted and amended without a minute of public hearings or formal committee debate in either house.

Aside from the procedural shortcuts employed, there is considerable merit to the Buckley-Pell amendment just advanced. In large part the new language clarifies and improves the original law. Some critics had charged, for instance, that the act would keep schools from disclosing the heights and weights of football players. Sens. Buckley and Pell agree that isn't so. To meet a more serious potential problem, the senators decided that college students should not be permitted to look at financial data which their parents submit in applying for aid. Similarly, the senators recognized that it may not always be wise to disclose medical or psychological records to students undergoing treatment. The new amendment provides for disclosure of such information to a physician of the student's choice.

The future status of letters and statements of recommendation is the issue causing the greatest fuss on college campuses. Until now, the confidentiality of such recommendations has generally been assumed. To let students see evaluations already made, many educators argue, would violate the privacy of those who wrote the comments. To open such files in the future, they assert, would reduce written recommendations to meaningless platitudes and make the academic community use other methods—probably phone calls—to convey the candid assessments involved in decisions on admissions, employment and academic honors. Harvard University, for one, feels so strongly about this that past letters of recommendation are being removed from students' files and returned to the writers. The most dramatic result of this purging process has been the discovery of a case of forgery by a student—but that's another story.

It is one thing to maintain that past pledges of confidentiality should be respected. That is a reasonable and persuasive view. But it is something else to argue that the whole system of private communications about students should not be changed. Professors, like managers in the business world, may not enjoy the prospect of criticizing those under them face-to-face. The change may be doubly traumatic for faculty members because other forces, primarily equal opportunity laws, have already brought so many challenges to the traditional methods of evaluating people in the academic world. But if those methods are so fragile or capricious that they can't stand scrutiny, there is no stronger argument for change.

The Buckley-Pell amendment sets an inconclusive course. Students may not inspect confidential recommendations already in their files or placed there by Jan. 1. Thereafter, students may waive the right of access to specific types of evaluations but may not be compelled to do so. No doubt many students will assert their rights—and faculty members should respond with candor and good faith. The purpose of disclosure, after all, is not simply to let a student find out what his professors think of him. The broader goal is to discourage arbitrary, unreasonable and unfair evaluations and thus to make the entire system of educational decision-making more reliable and trustworthy than before.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INDIAN SELF-DETERMINATION AND EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT

MR. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the Senate bill (S. 1017) to promote maximum Indian participation in the Government and education of the Indian people; to provide for the full participation of Indian tribes in programs and services conducted by the Federal Government for Indians and to encourage the development of the human resources of the Indian people; to establish a program of assistance to upgrade Indian education; to support the right to Indian citizens to control their own educational activities; to train professionals in Indian education; to establish an Indian youth intern program; and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection. The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1017

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act".

CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress, after careful review of the Federal Government's historical and special legal relationship with, and resulting responsibilities to, American Indian people, finds that—

(1) the prolonged Federal domination of Indian service programs has served to retard rather than enhance the progress of Indian people and their communities by depriving Indians of the full opportunity to develop leadership skills crucial to the realization of self-government, and has denied to the Indian people an effective voice in the planning and implementation of programs for the benefit of Indians which are responsive to the true needs of Indian communities; and

(2) the Indian people will never surrender their desire to control their relationships both among themselves and with non-Indian governments, organizations, and persons.

(b) The Congress further finds that—

(1) true self-determination in any society of people is dependent upon an educational process which will insure the development of qualified people to fulfill meaningful leadership roles;

(2) the Federal responsibility for and assistance to education of Indian children, Indian adult education, and Indian skills training has not effected the desired level of educational achievement or created the diverse opportunities and personal satisfaction which education can and should provide; and

(3) parental and community control of the educational process is of crucial importance to the Indian people.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress hereby recognizes the obligation of the United States to respond to the strong expression of the Indian people for self-determination by assuring maximum Indian participation in the direction of educational as well as other Federal services to Indian communities so as to render such services more responsive to the needs and desires of those communities.

(b) The Congress declares its commitment to the maintenance of the Federal Government's unique and continuing relationship with and responsibility to the Indian people through the establishment of a meaningful Indian self-determination policy which will permit an orderly transition from Federal domination of programs for and services to Indians to effective and meaningful participation by the Indian people in the planning, conduct, and administration of those programs and services.

(c) The Congress declares that a major national goal of the United States is to provide the quantity and quality of educational services and opportunities which will permit Indian children and adults to complete and excel in the life areas of their choice, and to achieve the measure of self-determination essential to their social and economic well being.

December 19, 1974

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. For the purposes of this Act, the term—

(a) "Indian" means a person who is a member of an Indian tribe;

(b) "Indian tribe" means any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688), which is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians;

(c) "tribal organization" means the elected governing body of any Indian tribe or any legally established organization of Indians which is controlled by one or more such bodies or by a board of directors elected or selected by one or more such bodies (or elected by the Indian population to be served by such organization) and which includes the maximum participation of Indians in all phases of its activities;

(d) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior;

(e) "school district" means any political subdivision of a State which is responsible for the provision, administration, and control of public education through grade 12 as defined by the law of such State; and

(f) "State education agency" means the State board of education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for supervision by the State of public elementary and secondary schools, or, if there is no such officer or agency, an officer or agency designated by the Governor or by State law.

TITLE I—THE INDIAN SELF-DETERMINATION ACT

SEC. 101. This title may be cited as the "Indian Self-Determination Act".

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

SEC. 102. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of any such Indian tribe to plan, conduct, and administer programs, or portions thereof, provided for in the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended by this Act, parts B and D of title II of this Act, any other program or portion thereof which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to administer for the benefit of Indians under the Act of November 2, 1921 (42 Stat. 208), and any Act may initially decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds that:

(1) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted will not be satisfactory, (2) adequate protection of trust resources is not assured, or (3) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract: Provided further, That in arriving at his finding, the Secretary shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization is deficient with respect to (1) equipment, (2) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (3) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (4) community support for the contract, (5) adequately trained personnel, or (6) other necessary components of contract performance.

(b) Whenever the Secretary declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to subsection (a) of this section he shall (1) state his objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days, (2) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome his stated objections, and (3) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as he may promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal on the objections raised.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to require any tribe requesting that he enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance: Provided, however, That each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the tribe's sovereign immunity outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy insurance.

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

SEC. 103. (a) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of any such Indian tribe to carry out any or all of his functions, authorities, and responsibilities under the Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended: Provided, however, That the Secretary may initially decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds that: (1) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted for will not be satisfactory, (2) adequate protection of trust resources is not assured, or (3) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract: Provided further, That the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, in arriving at his finding, shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization will be deficient with respect to (1) equipment, (2) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (3) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (4) community support for the contract, (5) adequately trained personnel, or (6) other necessary components of contract performance.

(b) Whenever the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to subsection (a) of this section he shall (1) state his objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days, (2) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome his stated objections, and (3) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal on the objections raised.

(c) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is authorized to require any tribe requesting that he enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance: Provided, however, That each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise the defense of tribal immunity from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the tribe's sovereign immunity outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.

GRANTS TO INDIAN TRIBAL ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 104. The Secretaries of the Interior and of Health, Education, and Welfare are each authorized, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to make a grant or grants to any tribal organization of such Indian tribe for planning, training, evaluation, and other activities specifically designed to make it possible for such tribal organization to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to sections 102 and 103 of this Act.

DETAIL OF PERSONNEL

SEC. 105. (a) Section 3371(2) of chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended (1) by deleting the word "and" immediately after the semicolon in clause (A); (2) by deleting the period at the end of clause (B) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and"; and (3) by adding at the end thereof the following new clause: "(C) any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688), which is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians."

(b) The Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended, is further amended by adding a new section 8 after section 7 of the Act, as follows:

"SEC. 8. In accordance with subsection (d) of section 214 of the Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 690), as amended, upon the request of any Indian tribe, band, group, or community, commissioned officers of the Service may be assigned by the Secretary for the purpose of assisting such Indian tribe, group, band, or community in carrying out the provisions of contracts with, or grants to, tribal organizations pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act."

(c) Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 (81 Stat. 100), as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "Environmental Science Services Administration" the words "or who are assigned to assist Indian tribes, groups, bands, or communities pursuant to the Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended."

"ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS"

SEC. 106. (a) Contracts with tribal organizations pursuant to sections 102 and 103 of this Act shall be in accordance with all Federal contracting laws and regulations except that, in the discretion of the appropriate Secretary, such contracts may be negotiated without advertising and need not conform with the provisions of the Act of August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 793), as amended.

(b) Payments of any grants or under any contracts pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement and in such installments and on such conditions as the appropriate Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

(c) Any contract requested by a tribe pursuant to sections 102 and 103 of this Act shall be for a term not to exceed one year unless the appropriate Secretary determines that a longer term would be advisable: Provided, That such term may not exceed three years and shall be subject to the availability of appropriations: Provided further, That the amount of such contracts may be renegotiated annually to reflect factors, including but not limited to cost increases, beyond the control of a tribal organization.

(d) Notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, the appropriate Secretary may, at the request or consent of a tribal organization, revise or amend any contract or grant made by him pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act with such organization as necessary to carry out the purposes of this title: Provided, however, That whenever an Indian tribe requests retrocession of the appropriate Secretary for any contract entered into pursuant to this Act, such retrocession shall become effective upon a date specified by the appropriate Secretary not more than one hundred and twenty days from the date of the request by the tribe or at such later date as may be mutually agreed to by the appropriate Secretary and the tribe.

(c) In connection with any contract or grant made pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act, the appropriate Secretary or agency head may permit a tribal organization to utilize, in carrying out such contract or grant, existing school buildings, hospitals, and other facilities and all equipment therein or appertaining thereto and other personal property owned by the Government within his jurisdiction under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

(f) The contracts authorized under sections 102 and 103 of this Act and grants pursuant to section 104 of this Act may include provisions for the performance of personal services which would otherwise be performed by Federal employees: Provided, That the Secretary shall not make any contract which would impair his ability to discharge his trust responsibilities to any Indian tribe or individuals.

(g) Contracts with tribal organizations and regulations adopted pursuant to this Act shall include provisions to assure the fair and uniform provision by such organizations of services and assistance to Indians in the conduct and administration of programs or activities under such contracts.

Sec. 107. (a) The Secretaries of the Interior and of Health, Education, and Welfare are each authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying out of the provisions of this title.

(b) (1) Within six months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall, to the extent practicable, consult with national and regional Indian organizations to consider and formulate appropriate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(2) Within seven months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall present the proposed rules and regulations to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

(3) Within eight months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall publish proposed rules and regulations in the Federal Register for the purpose of receiving comments from interested parties.

(4) Within ten months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall promulgate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(c) The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare are authorized to revise and amend any rules or regulations promulgated pursuant to this section: Provided, That prior to any revision or amendment to such rules or regulations the respective Secretary or Secretaries shall, to the extent practicable, consult with appropriate national or regional Indian organizations and shall publish any proposed revisions in the Federal Register not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of such rules and regulations in order to provide adequate notice to, and receive comments from, other interested parties.

Sec. 108. For each fiscal year during which an Indian tribal organization receives or expends funds pursuant to a contract or grant under this title, the Indian tribe which requested such contract or grant shall submit to the appropriate Secretary a report including, but not limited to, an accounting of the amounts and purposes for which Federal funds were expended, information on conduct of the program or service involved, and such other information as the appropriate Secretary may request. The reports and records of the Indian tribal organization with respect to such contract or grant shall be subject to audit by the appropriate Secretary and the Comptroller General of the United States.

Sec. 109. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of section 104 of this title the amount of $3,000,000 to the Department of the Interior and $2,000,000 to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for each of three succeeding fiscal years following the date of enactment of this Act.

Sec. 110. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as—

(1) affecting, modifying, diminishing, or otherwise impairing the sovereign immunity from suit enjoyed by any Indian tribe; or

(2) authorizing or requiring the termination of any existing trust responsibility of the United States with respect to the Indian people.

TITLE II—THE INDIAN EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT

Sec. 201. This title may be cited as the "Indian Education Assistance Act".

PART A—EDUCATION OF INDIANS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Sec. 202. The Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"Sec. 4. The Secretary of the Interior shall not enter into any contract for the education of Indians unless the prospective contractor has submitted to, and has had approved by the Secretary of the Interior, an education plan, which plan, in the determination of the Secretary, contains educational objectives which adequately address the educational needs of the Indian students who are to be beneficiaries of the contract and assures that the contract is capable of meeting such objectives.

"Sec. 5. (a) Whenever a school district affected by a contract or contracts for the education of Indians pursuant to this Act has a local school board not composed of a majority of Indians, the parents of the Indian children enrolled in the school or schools affected by such contract or contracts shall elect a local committee from among their number. Such committee shall fully participate in the development of, and shall have the authority to approve or disapprove programs to be conducted under such contract or contracts, and shall carry out such other duties, and be so structured, as the Secretary of the Interior shall by regulation provide: Provided, however, That, whenever a local Indian committee or committees established pursuant to section 305(b)(2) (B) (ii) of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235) or an Indian advisory school board or boards established pursuant to this Act prior to the date of enactment of this section exists in school district, such committee or board may, in the discretion of the affected tribal governing body or bodies, be utilized for the purposes of this section.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, revoke any contract if the contractor fails to permit a local committee to perform its duties pursuant to subsection (a).

"Sec. 6. Any school district educating Indian students who are members of recognized Indian tribes, who do not normally reside in the State in which such school district is located, and who are residing in Federal boarding facilities for the purposes of attending public schools within such district may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be reimbursed by him for the full per capita costs of educating such Indian students.

"Sec. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the education of Indians pursuant to this Act $65,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1975 and 1976."

Sec. 203. After conferring with persons competent in the field of Indian education, the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall prepare and submit to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives not later than October 1, 1974, 1975, a report which shall include—

(1) a comprehensive analysis of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, including—

(A) factors determining the allocation of funds for the special or supplemental educational programs of Indian students and current operating expenditures;

(B) the relationship of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, to—

(i) title I of the Act of September 30, 1950 (64 Stat. 1100), as amended; and

(ii) the Act of April 11, 1965 (79 Stat. 27), as amended; and

(iii) title IV of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235); and

(iv) the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended;

(2) a specific program to meet the special educational needs of Indian children, who attend public schools. Such program shall include, but need not be limited to, the following:

(A) a plan for the equitable distribution of funds to meet the special or supplemental educational needs of Indian children and, where necessary, to provide general operating expenditures to schools and school districts educating Indian children; and

(B) an estimate of the cost of such program;

(3) detailed legislative recommendations to implement the program prepared pursuant to clause (2); and

(4) a specific program, together with detailed legislative recommendations, to assist the development and administration of Indian-controlled community colleges.

PART B—PREPARATION OF PROFESSIONALS IN INDIAN EDUCATION

Sec. 204. (a) The Secretary is authorized to establish and carry out a program of making grants, to, and contracts with, institutions of higher education and other public, private nonprofit organizations or agencies, or Indian tribes or tribal organizations with relevant experience and expertise in order to provide fellowship and carry out programs and projects to—

(1) prepare persons to serve Indians in public, private, or jointly federally funded schools as educational administrators, teachers, teacher aides, and ancillary educational personnel, including, but not limited to, school social workers, guidance counselors, nurses, and librarians; and

(2) improve the qualifications of persons who are serving Indians in such capacities.

(b) In selecting participants in or recipients for fellowships to programs and projects under this section preference shall be given to Indians.

(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed to develop criteria pursuant to which he shall evaluate all grants and contracts authorized under this section.

Sec. 205. For the purpose of making grants or contracts pursuant to this part B there is authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for the fiscal year after the enactment of this Act, and $15,000,000 for each of the next two succeeding fiscal years.

PART C—SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Sec. 206. (a) The Secretary is authorized to enter into a contract or contracts with any State education agency or school district for the purpose of assisting such agency or district in the acquisition of sites for, or the construction, acquisition, or renovation of facilities (including all necessary equipment) in school districts on or adjacent to or in close proximity to any Indian reservation or other lands held in trust by the United States for Indians, if such facilities are necessary for the education of Indians residing on any such reservation or lands.

(b) The Secretary may expend not less than 75 per centum of such funds as are authorized and appropriated pursuant to this part C on those projects which meet the eligibility requirements under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended. Such funds shall be allocated on the basis of existing funding priorities, if any, established by the United States Commissioner of Education under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950, as amended. The United States Commissioner of Education is directed to submit to the Secretary, at the beginning of each fiscal year, commencing with the first full fiscal year after the date of enactment of this Act, a list of those projects eligible for funding under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950, as amended.

(c) The Secretary may expend not more than 25 per centum of such funds as may be authorized and appropriated pursuant to this part C on any school eligible to receive funds under section 218 of this Act.

(d) Any contract entered into by the Secretary pursuant to this section shall contain provisions requiring the relevant State educational agency to—

(1) provide Indian students attending any such facilities constructed, acquired, or renovated, in whole or in part, from funds made available pursuant to this section with standards of education not less than those provided non-Indian students in the school district in which the facilities are situated; and

(2) meet, with respect to such facilities, the requirements of the State and local building codes, and other building standards set by the State educational agency or school district for other public school facilities under its jurisdiction or control or by the local government in the jurisdiction within which the facilities are situated.

(e) The Secretary shall consult with the entity designated pursuant to section 5 of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended by this Act, and with the governing body of any Indian tribe or tribes the educational opportunity for the members of which will be significantly affected by any contract entered into pursuant to this section. Such consultation shall be advisory only, but shall occur prior to the entering into of any such contract. The foregoing provisions of this subsection shall not be applicable where the application for a contract pursuant to this section is submitted by an elected school board of which a majority of its members are Indians.

(f) For the purpose of implementing the provisions of this section, the Secretary shall assure that the rates of pay for personnel engaged in the construction or renovation of facilities constructed or carried out in whole or in part by funds made available pursuant to this section are not less than the prevailing local wage rates for similar work as determined in accordance with the Act of March 3, 1921 (46 Stat. 1491), as amended.

(g) Within ninety days following the expiration of the three-year period following the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall evaluate the effectiveness of the program pursuant to this section and transmit a report of such evaluation of the Congress. Such report shall include—

(1) an analysis of construction costs and the impact on such costs of the provisions of subsection (f) of this section and the Act of March 3, 1921 (46 Stat. 1491), as amended;

(2) a description of the working relationship between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare including any memorandum of understanding in connection with the acquisition of data pursuant to subsection (b) of this section;

(3) projections of the Secretary of future construction needs of the public schools serving Indian children residing on or adjacent to Indian reservations;

(4) a description of the working relationship of the Department of the Interior with local or State educational agencies in connection with the contracting for construction, acquisition, or renovation of school facilities pursuant to this section, and

(5) the recommendations of the Secretary with respect to the transfer of the responsibility for administering subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended, from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Department of the Interior.

(h) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section, there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $35,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975; $35,000,000 for each of the four succeeding fiscal years; and thereafter, such sums as may be necessary, all of such sums to remain available until expended.

PART D—YOUTH INTERN PROGRAM

Sec. 207. In order to provide meaningful and career related work opportunities for Indian youth who are not enrolled in educational programs during the summer months, the Secretary is authorized to establish and carry out an Indian youth intern program for any Indian sixteen years of age or older who is regularly enrolled in secondary school, vocational school, or higher education program during usual school terms.

Sec. 208. (a) In establishing and administering the Indian youth intern program, the Secretary shall designate or recognize community service fields including those related to education, child development, recreation, law, health services, engineering, research, science, government, agriculture and forestry, business and commerce, and other appropriate pursuits, which can provide useful experience to Indian youth in exploring and participating in activities related to their future choices of possible careers.

(b) The Secretary shall determine the number of Indian youth in the community or reservation who are interested in employment during the summer months in the fields designated in subsection (a) of this section.

(c) The Secretary shall require negotiations with employers for the employment of each Indian Youth participating in the Indian youth intern program, such negotiations to include a job description outlining specific duties, evaluation of the progress of the Indian youth intern, and consultation by the employer with the Indian youth intern periodically.

Sec. 209. In establishing and carrying out the Indian youth intern program, the Secretary shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that—

(1) each Indian youth intern shall be paid not less than the Federal minimum wage;

(2) each Indian youth intern shall engage in activities which are supplemental to those of the regular work force where he is employed and shall not replace any regular adult full-time employee, except as a temporary substitute during any normal vacation or other such leave of any such employee;

(3) the total wages paid each Indian youth intern employed by a nonprofit agency shall be paid out of funds provided in this part D;

(4) one-half the wages paid each Indian youth intern employed by other than a nonprofit agency shall be paid out of funds provided in this part D, and one-half by the employer;

(5) each Indian youth intern shall be covered by appropriate workmen's compensation laws;

(6) no Indian youth intern shall be entitled, by reason of his employment as an intern, to participate in any pension, retirement, or unemployment compensation programs;

(7) there shall be one supervisor for each twenty Indian youth interns during their period of employment; that such supervisor shall be compensated at a rate not in excess of the minimum rate for GS-9 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code; and that, with respect to the position of supervisor, preference shall be given to qualified Indians residing in the locality in which the interns are employed.

Sec. 210. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this part D, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for the first fiscal year after the enactment of this Act, and $15,000,000 for each of the next two succeeding fiscal years.

PART E—EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Sec. 211. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to and contracts with universities and colleges and other public and private nonprofit agencies, institutions, and organizations, and to and with individuals for research, surveys, and demonstrations in the field of Indian education and for the dissemination of information derived from such research, surveys, and demonstrations.

(b) No grant shall be made or contract entered into pursuant to this section until the Secretary has obtained the advice and recommendations of educational specialists who are competent to evaluate proposals as to the soundness of design, prospects of productive results, and adequacy of the resources of any applicant to conduct research, surveys, or demonstration projects. Whenever possible among the educational specialists consulted shall be Indians who are not employees of the Federal Government.

(c) No grant shall be made or contract entered into pursuant to this section until the Secretary is satisfied that the activities to be funded do not substantially duplicate research, surveys, or demonstrations the results of which are or will be accessible to the public.

Sec. 212. For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this part E, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for the first fiscal year after enactment of this Act, and $3,000,000 for each of the next two succeeding fiscal years.

PART F—ADULT, VOCATIONAL, AND EARLY CHILDHOOD EDUCATION

Sec. 213. After consultation with persons competent in the appropriate field of education, which persons shall include Indians who are not employees of the Federal Government, the Secretary shall present to the Ninety-fourth Congress, within sixty days of the convening thereof—

(1) a proposed program of adult and continuing education designed to meet the needs of Indian people;

(2) a proposed program designed to meet the vocational and technical career education needs of Indian people;

UMI

December 19, 1974

(3) a proposed program designed to meet the early childhood needs of the Indian people;

(4) a proposed program designed to meet the special education needs of gifted and handicapped Indians aged three to twenty one years;

(5) a review and analysis of existing programs in higher education for Indians administered by the Department of the Interior, and a proposed program of higher education designed to meet the needs of the Indian people; and

(6) an assessment of the capability of the Federal Government to measure effectively and accurately the educational progress and achievement of Indian people, such assessment to include a review of the ability of the Department of the Interior to measure the educational achievement and progress of Indian people. The Secretary is further directed in the preparation of such an assessment to consult with the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and such other agency heads as he deems appropriate, as to the capability of the Office of Education or the National Institute on Education to measure the educational progress and achievement of Indian people, and shall include the result of such consultations in such report.

Sec. 214. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this part F, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $750,000 for the first fiscal year after the enactment of this Act.

PART C—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Sec. 215. No funds from any grant or contract pursuant to this title shall be made available to any school district unless the Secretary is satisfied that the quality and standard of education, including facilities and auxiliary services, for Indian students enrolled in the school of such district are at least equal to that provided all other students from resources, other than resources provided in this title, available to the local school district.

Sec. 216. No funds from any contract or grant pursuant to this title except as provided in part B shall be made available by any Federal agency directly to other than public agencies and Indian tribes, institutions, and organizations: Provided, That school districts, State education agencies, and Indian tribes, institutions, and organizations assisted by this title may use funds provided herein to contract for necessary services with any appropriate individual, organization, or corporation.

Sec. 217. (a) (1) Within six months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall, to the extent practicable, consult with national and regional Indian organizations with experiences in Indian education to consider and formulate appropriate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(2) Within seven months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall present the proposed rules and regulations to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

(3) Within eight months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall publish proposed rules and regulations in the Federal Register for the purpose of receiving comments from interested parties.

(4) Within ten months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to revise and amend any rules or regulations promulgated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section: Provided, That prior to any revision or amendment to such rules or regulations the Secretary shall, to the extent practicable, consult with appropriate national and regional Indian organizations, and shall publish any proposed revisions in the Federal Register not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of such rules and regulations in order to provide adequate notice to, and receive comments from, other interested parties.

Sec. 218. The Secretary is authorized and directed to provide funds, pursuant to this Act; the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended; or any other authority granted by him to any tribe or tribal organization which controls and manages any previously private school. The Secretary shall transmit annually to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives a report on the educational assistance program conducted pursuant to this section.

Sec. 219. The assistance provided in this Act for the education of Indians in the public schools of any State is in addition and supplemental to assistance provided under title IV of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235).

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to provide maximum Indian participation in the Government and education of the Indian people; to provide for the full participation of Indian tribes in programs and services conducted by the Federal Government for Indians and to encourage the development of human resources of the Indian people; to establish a program of assistance to upgrade Indian education; to support the right of Indian citizens to control their own educational activities; and for other purposes."

Mr. MEEDS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

With the following committee amendments:

S. 1017

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act".

CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS

Sec. 2. (a) The Congress, after careful review of the Federal Government's historical and special legal relationship with, and resulting responsibilities to, American Indian people, finds that—

(1) the prolonged Federal domination of Indian service programs has served to retard rather than enhance the progress of Indian people and their communities by depriving Indians of the full opportunity to develop leadership skills crucial to the realization of self-government, and has denied to the Indian people an effective voice in the planning and implementation of programs for the benefit of Indians which are responsive to the true needs of Indian communities; and

(2) the Indian people will never surrender their desire to control their relationships both among themselves and with non-Indian governments, organizations, and persons.

(b) The Congress further finds that—

(1) true self-determination in any society of people is dependent upon an educational process which will insure the development of qualified people to fulfill meaningful leadership roles;

(2) the Federal responsibility for and assistance to education of Indian children has not effected the desired level of educational achievement or created the diverse opportunities and personal satisfaction which education can and should provide; and

(3) parental and community control of the educational process is of crucial importance to the Indian people.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

Sec. 3. (a) The Congress hereby recognizes the obligation of the United States to respond to the strong expression of the Indian people for self-determination by assuring maximum Indian participation in the direction of educational as well as other Federal services to Indian communities so as to render such services more responsive to the needs and desires of those communities.

(b) The Congress declares its commitment to the maintenance of the Federal Government's unique and continuing relationship with and responsibility to the Indian people through the establishment of a meaningful Indian self-determination policy which will permit an orderly transition from Federal domination of programs for and services to Indians to effective and meaningful participation by the Indian people in the planning, conduct, and administration of those programs and services.

(c) The Congress declares that a major national goal of the United States is to provide the quantity and quality of educational services and opportunities which will permit Indian children to compete and excel in the life areas of their choice, and to achieve the measure of self-determination essential to their social and economic well-being.

DEFINITIONS

Sec. 4. For the purposes of this Act, the term—

(a) "Indian" means a person who is a member of an Indian tribe;

(b) "Indian Tribe" means any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village or regional or village corporation as defined in or established pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688) which is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians;

(c) "Tribal organization" means the recognized governing body of any Indian tribe; any legally established organization of Indians which is controlled, sanctioned, or chartered by such governing body or which is democratically elected by the adult members of the Indian community to be served by such organization and which includes the maximum participation of Indians in all phases of its activities: Provided, That in any case where a contract is let or grant made to an organization to perform services benefiting more than one Indian tribe, the approval of each such Indian tribe shall be a prerequisite to the letting or making of such contract or grant;

(d) "Secretary", unless otherwise designated, means the Secretary of the Interior;

(f) "State education agency" means the State board of education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for supervision by the State of public elementary and secondary schools, or, if there is no such officer or agency, an officer or agency designated by the Governor or by State law.

REPORTING AND AUDIT REQUIREMENTS

Sec. 5 (a) Each recipient of Federal financial assistance from the Secretary of Interior or the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, under this Act, shall keep such records as the appropriate Secretary shall prescribe, including records which fully disclose the amount and disposition by such recipient of the proceeds of such assistance, the cost of the project or undertaking in connection with which such assistance is given or used, the amount of that portion of the cost of the project or undertaking supplied by other sources, and such other records as will facilitate an effective audit.

(b) The Comptroller General and the appropriate Secretary, or any of their duly authorized representatives, shall, until the expiration of three years after completion of the project or undertaking referred to in the preceding subsection of this section, have access (for the purpose of audit and examination) to any books, documents, papers, and records of such recipients which in the opinion of the Comptroller General or the appropriate Secretary may be related or pertinent to the grants, controls, subcontracts, subgrants, or other arrangements referred to in the preceding subsection.

(c) Each recipient of Federal financial assistance referred to in subsection (a) of this section shall make such reports and information available to the Indian people served for or represented by such recipient as and in a manner determined to be adequate by the appropriate Secretary.

(d) Any funds paid to a financial assistance recipient referred to in subsection (a) of this section and not expended or used for the purposes for which paid shall be repaid to the Treasury of the United States.

PENALTIES

Sec. 6. Whoever, being an officer, director, agent, or employee of, or connected in any capacity with, any recipient of a contract, subcontract, grant, or subgrant pursuant to this Act or the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, embezzles, willfully misapplies, steals, or obtains by fraud any of the money, funds, assets, or property which are the subject of such a grant, subcontract, contract, or subcontract, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both, but if the amount so embezzled, misapplied, stolen, or obtained by fraud does not exceed $100, he shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

WAGE AND LABOR STANDARDS

Sec. 7. (a) All laborers and mechanics employed by contractors of subcontracts in the construction, alteration, or repair, including painting or decorating of buildings or other facilities in connection with contracts or grants entered into pursuant to this Act, shall be paid wages at not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality, as determined by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1494), as amended. With respect to construction, alteration, or repair work to which the Act of March 3, 1921 is applicable under the terms of this section, the Secretary of Labor shall have the authority and functions set forth in Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (15 F.R. 3176; 64 Stat. 1267) and section 2 of the Act of June 13, 1934 (48 Stat. 948, 40 U.S.C. 276c).

(b) Any contract, subcontract, grant, or subgrant pursuant to this Act, the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, or any other Act authorizing Federal contracts with or grants to Indian organizations or for the benefit of Indians, shall require that to the greatest extent feasible—

(1) preferences and opportunities for training and employment in connection with the administration of such contracts or grants shall be given to Indians; and

(2) preference in the award of subcontracts and subgrants in connection with the administration of such contracts or grants shall be given to Indian organizations and to Indian-owned economic enterprises as defined in section 3 of the Indian Financing Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 77).

CARRYOVER OF FUNDS

Sec. 8. The provisions of any other laws to the contrary notwithstanding, any funds appropriated pursuant to the Act of November 2, 1921 (42 Stat. 208), for any fiscal year which are not obligated and expended prior to the beginning of the fiscal year succeeding the fiscal year for which such funds were appropriated shall remain available for obligation and expenditure during such succeeding fiscal year.

TITLE I—INDIAN SELF-DETERMINATION ACT

Sec. 101. This title may be cited as the "Indian Self-Determination Act".

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Sec. 102. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of any such Indian tribe to plan, conduct, and administer programs, or portions thereof, provided for in the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended by this Act, any other program or portion thereof which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to administer for the benefit of Indians under the Act of November 2, 1921 (42 Stat. 208), and any Act subsequent thereto: Provided, however, That the Secretary may initially decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds that: (1) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted will not be satisfactory; (2) adequate protection of trust resources is not assured, or (3) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract: Provided further, That in arriving at his finding, the Secretary shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization would be deficient in performance under the contract with respect to (A) equipment, (B) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (C) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (D) community support for the contract, (E) adequately trained personnel, or (F) other necessary components of contract performance.

(b) Whenever the Secretary declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, he shall (1) state his objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days, (2) provide to the extent practicable assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome his stated objections, and (3) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as he may promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal on the objections raised.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to require any tribe requesting that he enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance: Provided, however, That each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise as a defense the tribe's sovereign immunity from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the tribe's sovereign immunity outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.

CONTRACTS BY THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

Sec. 103. (a) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is directed, upon the request of any Indian tribe, to enter into a contract or contracts with any tribal organization of any such Indian tribe to carry out any or all of his functions, authorities, and responsibilities under the Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended: Provided, however, That the Secretary may initially decline to enter into any contract requested by an Indian tribe if he finds that: (1) the service to be rendered to the Indian beneficiaries of the particular program or function to be contracted for will not be satisfactory; (2) adequate protection of trust resources is not assured; or (3) the proposed project or function to be contracted for cannot be properly completed or maintained by the proposed contract: Provided further, That the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, in arriving at his finding, shall consider whether the tribe or tribal organization would be deficient in performance under the contract with respect to (A) equipment, (B) bookkeeping and accounting procedures, (C) substantive knowledge of the program to be contracted for, (D) community support for the contract, (E) adequately trained personnel, or (F) other necessary components of contract performance.

(b) Whenever the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare declines to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, he shall (1) state his objections in writing to the tribe within sixty days; (2) provide, to the extent practicable, assistance to the tribe or tribal organization to overcome his stated objections; and (3) provide the tribe with a hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall promulgate, and the opportunity for appeal on the objections raised.

(c) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is authorized to require any tribe requesting that he enter into a contract pursuant to the provisions of this title to obtain adequate liability insurance: Provided, however, That each such policy of insurance shall contain a provision that the insurance carrier shall waive any right it may have to raise as a defense the tribe's sovereign immunity from suit, but that such waiver shall extend only to claims the amount and nature of which are within the coverage and limits of the policy and shall not authorize or empower such insurance carrier to waive or otherwise limit the tribe's sovereign immunity outside or beyond the coverage and limits of the policy of insurance.

GRANTS TO INDIAN TRIBAL ORGANIZATIONS

Sec. 104. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the request of any Indian tribe (from funds appropriated for the benefit of Indians pursuant to the Act of November 2, 1921 (42 Stat. 208), and any Act subsequent thereto) to contract with or make a grant or grants to any tribal organization for—

(1) the strengthening or improvement of tribal government (including, but not limited to, the development, improvement, and administration of planning, financial management, or merit personnel systems; the improvement of tribally funded programs or activities; or the development, construction, improvement, maintenance, preservation, or operation of tribal facilities or resources);

(2) the planning, training, evaluation of other activities designed to improve the capacity of a tribal organization to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to section 102 of this Act and the additional costs associated with the initial years of operation under such a contract or contracts;

(3) the acquisition of land in connection with items (1) and (2) above: Provided, That in the case of land within reservation boundaries or which adjoins on at least two sides lands held in trust by the United States for the tribe or for individual Indians, the Secretary of the Interior may (upon request of the tribe) acquire such land in trust for the tribe; or

(4) the planning, designing, monitoring, and evaluating of Federal programs serving the tribe.

(b) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare may, in accordance with regulations adopted pursuant to section 107 of this Act, make grants to any Indian tribe or tribal organization for—

December 19, 1974

(1) the development, construction, operation, provision, or maintenance of adequate health facilities or services including the training of personnel for such work, from funds appropriated to the Indian Health Service for Indian health services or Indian health facilities; or

(2) planning, training, evaluation or other activities designed to improve the capacity of a tribal organization to enter into a contract or contracts pursuant to section 103 of this Act.

(c) The provisions of any other Act notwithstanding, any funds made available to a tribal organization under grants pursuant to this section may be used as matching shares for any other Federal grant programs which contribute to the purposes for which grants under this section are made.

PERSONNEL

SEC. 105. (a) Section 3371(2) of chapter 33 of title 5, United States Code, is amended (1) by deleting the word "and" immediately after the semicolon in clause (A); (2) by deleting the period at the end of clause (B) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and"; and (3) by adding at the end thereof the following new clause:

"(C) any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688), which is recognized as eligible for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians and includes any tribal organization as defined in section 4(c) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act."

(b) The Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended, is further amended by adding a new section 8 after section 7 of the Act, as follows:

"SEC. 8. In accordance with subsection (d) of section 214 of the Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 690), as amended, upon the request of any Indian tribe, band, group, or community, commissioned officers of the Service may be assigned by the Secretary for the purpose of assisting such Indian tribe, group, band, or community in carrying out the provisions of contracts with, or grants to, tribal organizations pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act."

(c) Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of section 8 of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 (81 Stat. 100), as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "Environmental Science Services Administration" the words "or who are assigned to assist Indian tribes, groups, bands, or communities pursuant to the Act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), as amended".

(d) Section 502 of the Intergovernmental Personnel Act of 1970 (84 Stat. 1909, 1925) is amended—

(1) by deleting the word "and" after paragraph (3);

(2) by deleting the period after paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) Notwithstanding the population requirements of section 203(a) and 303(c) of this Act, a 'local government' and a 'general local government' also mean the recognized governing body of an Indian tribe, band, pueblo, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village, as defined in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688), which performs substantial governmental functions. The requirements of sections 203(c) and 303(d) of this Act, relating to reviews by the Governor of a State, do not apply to grant applications from the governing body of an Indian tribe, although nothing in this Act is intended to discourage or prohibit voluntary communication and cooperation between Indian tribes and State and local governments."

(e) Notwithstanding any other law, executive order, or administrative regulation, an employee serving under an appointment not limited to one year or less who leaves Federal employment to be employed by a tribal organization on or before December 31, 1985, in connection with governmental or other activities which are or have been performed by employees in or for Indian communities is entitled, if the employee and the tribal organization so elect, to the following:

(1) To retain coverage, rights, and benefits under subchapter I of chapter 81 ("Compensation for Work Injuries") of title 5, United States Code, and for this purpose his employment with the tribal organization shall be deemed employment by the United States. However, if an injured employee, or his dependents in case of his death, receives from the tribal organization any payment (including an allowance, gratuity, payment under an insurance policy for which the premium is wholly paid by the tribal organization, or other benefit of any kind) on account of the same injury or death, the amount of that payment shall be credited against any benefit payable under subchapter I of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, as follows:

(A) payments on account of injury or disability shall be credited against disability compensation payable to the injured employee; and

(B) payments on account of death shall be credited against death compensation payable to dependents of the deceased employee.

(2) To retain coverage, rights, and benefits under chapter 83 ("Retirement") of title 5, United States Code, if necessary employee deductions and agency contributions in payment for the period of employment are currently deposited in the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund (section 8348 of title 5, United States Code); and the period during which coverage, rights, and benefits are retained under this paragraph is deemed creditable service under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code. Days of unused sick leave to the credit of an employee under a formal leave system at the time the employee leaves Federal employment to be employed by a tribal organization remain to his credit for retirement purposes during covered service with the tribal organization.

(3) To retain coverage, rights, and benefits under chapter 89 ("Health Insurance") of title 5, United States Code, if necessary employee deductions and agency contributions in payment for the period of employment are currently deposited in the Employee's Health Benefit Fund (section 8909 of title 5, United States Code); and the period during which coverage, rights, and benefits are retained under this paragraph is deemed service as an employee under chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code.

(4) To retain coverage, rights, and benefits under chapter 87 ("Life Insurance") of title 5, United States Code, if necessary employee deductions and agency contributions in payment for the period of employment with the tribal organizations are currently deposited in the Employee's Life Insurance Fund (section 8714 of title 5, United States Code); and the period during which coverage, rights, and benefits are retained under this paragraph is deemed service as an employee under chapter 87 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) During the period an employee is entitled to the coverage, rights, and benefits pursuant to the preceding subsection, the tribal organization employing such employee shall deposit currently in the appropriate funds the employee deductions and agency contributions required by paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of such preceding subsection.

(g) An employee who is employed by a tribal organization under subsection (e) of this section and such tribal organization shall make the election to retain the coverages, rights, and benefits in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (4) of such subsection (e) before the date of his employment by a tribal organization. An employee who is employed by a tribal organization under subsection (e) of this section shall continue to be entitled to the benefits of such subsection if he is employed by another tribal organization to perform service in activities of the type described in such subsection.

(h) For the purposes of subsections (e), (f), and (g) of this section, the term "employee" means an employee as defined in section 2105 of title 5, United States Code.

(i) The President may prescribe regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of subsections (e), (f), (g), and (h) of this section and to protect and assure the compensation, retirement, insurance, leave, re-employment rights, and such other similar civil service employment rights as he finds appropriate.

(j) Anything in sections 205 and 207 of title 18, United States Code to the contrary notwithstanding, officers and employees of the United States assigned to an Indian tribe as authorized under section 3372 of title 5, United States Code, or section 2072 of the Revised Statutes (25 U.S.C. 48) and former officers and employees of the United States employed by Indian tribes may act as agents or attorneys for or appear on behalf of such tribes in connection with any matter pending before any department, agency, court, or commission, including any matter in which the United States is a party or has a direct and substantial interest: Provided, That each such officer or employee or former officer or employee must advise in writing the head of the department, agency, court, or commission with which he is dealing or appearing on behalf of the tribe of any personal and substantial involvement he may have had as an officer or employee of the United States in connection with the matter involved.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 106. (a) Contracts with tribal organizations pursuant to sections 102 and 103 of this Act shall be in accordance with all Federal contracting laws and regulations except that, in the discretion of the appropriate Secretary, such contracts may be negotiated without advertising and need not conform with the provisions of the Act of August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 793), as amended: Provided, That the appropriate Secretary may waive any provisions of such contracting laws or regulations which he determines are not appropriate for the purposes of the contract involved or inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

(b) Payments of any grants or under any contracts pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement and in such installments and on such conditions as the appropriate Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. The transfer of funds shall be scheduled consistent with program requirements and applicable Treasury regulations, so as to minimize the time elapsing between the transfer of such funds from the United States Treasury and the disbursement thereof by the tribal organization, whether such disbursement occurs prior to or subsequent to such transfer of funds. Tribal organizations shall not be held accountable for interest earned on such funds, pending their disbursement by such organization.

(c) Any contract requested by a tribe pursuant to sections 102 and 103 of this Act shall be for a term not to exceed one year unless the appropriate Secretary determines that a longer term would be advisable: Provided, That such term may not exceed three years and shall be subject to the availability of appropriations: Provided, further, That the amounts of such contracts may be renegotiated annually to reflect factors, including but not limited to cost increases beyond the control of a tribal organization.

(d) Notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, the appropriate Secretary may, at the request or consent of a tribal organization, revise or amend any contract or grant made by him pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act with such organization as necessary to carry out the purposes of this title: Provided, however, That whenever an Indian tribe requests retrocession of the appropriate Secretary for any contract entered into pursuant to this Act, such retrocession shall become effective upon a date specified by the appropriate Secretary not more than one hundred and twenty days from the date of the request by the tribe or at such later date as may be mutually agreed to by the appropriate Secretary and the tribe.

(e) In connection with any contract or grant made pursuant to section 102, 103, or 104 of this Act, the appropriate Secretary may permit a tribal organization to utilize, in carrying out such contract or grant, existing school buildings, hospitals, and other facilities and all equipment therein or pertaining thereto and other personal property owned by the Government within his jurisdiction under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

(f) The contracts authorized under sections 102 and 103 of this Act and grants pursuant to section 104 of this Act may include provisions for the performance of personal services which would otherwise be performed by Federal employees including, but in no way limited to, functions such as determination of eligibility of applicants for assistance, benefits, or services, and the extent or amount of such assistance, benefits, or services to be provided and the provisions of such assistance, benefits, or services, all in accordance with the terms of the contract or grant and applicable rules and regulations of the appropriate Secretary: Provided, That the Secretary shall not make any contract which would impair his ability to discharge his trust responsibilities to any Indian tribe or individuals.

(g) Contracts and grants with tribal organizations pursuant to sections 102, 103, and 104 of this Act and the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretaries of the Interior and Health, Education, and Welfare pursuant to section 107 of this Act shall include provisions to assure the fair and uniform provision by such tribal organizations of the services and assistance they provide to Indians under such contracts and grants.

(h) The amount of funds provided under the terms of contracts entered into pursuant to sections 102 and 103 shall not be less than the appropriate Secretary would have otherwise provided for his direct operation of the programs or portions thereof for the period covered by the contract: Provided, That any savings in operation under such contracts shall be utilized to provide additional services or benefits under the contract.

PROMULGATION OF RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 107. (a) The Secretaries of the Interior and of Health, Education, and Welfare are each authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this title.

(b) (1) Within six months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall each to the extent practicable, consult with national and regional Indian organizations to consider and formulate appropriate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(2) Within seven months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall each present the proposed rules and regulations to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

(3) Within eight months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall publish proposed rules and regulations in the Federal Register for the purpose of receiving comments from interested parties.

(4) Within ten months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall promulgate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(c) The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare are authorized to revise and amend any rules or regulations promulgated pursuant to this section: Provided, That prior to any revision or amendment to such rules or regulations, the respective Secretary or Secretaries shall present the proposed revision or amendment to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives and shall, to the extent practicable, consult with appropriate national or regional Indian organizations and shall publish any proposed revisions in the Federal Register not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of such rules and regulations in order to provide adequate notice to, and receive comments from, other interested parties.

REPORTS

SEC. 108. For each fiscal year during which an Indian tribal organization receives or expends funds pursuant to a contract or grant under this title, the Indian tribe which requested such contract or grant shall submit to the appropriate Secretary a report including, but not limited to, an accounting of the amounts and purposes for which Federal funds were expended, information on the conduct of the program or service involved, and such other information as the appropriate Secretary may request.

REASSUMPTION OF PROGRAMS

SEC. 109. Each contract or grant agreement entered into pursuant to sections 102, 103, and 104 of this Act shall provide that in any case where the appropriate Secretary determines that the tribal organization's performance under such contract or grant agreement involves (1) the violation of the rights or endangerment of the health, safety, or welfare of any persons; or (2) gross negligence or mismanagement in the handling or use of funds provided to the tribal organization pursuant to such contract or grant agreement, such Secretary may, under regulations prescribed by him and after providing notice and hearing to such tribal organization, rescind such contract or grant agreement and assume or resume control or operation of the program, activity, or service involved if he determines that the tribal organization has not taken corrective action as prescribed by him: Provided, That the appropriate Secretary may, upon notice to a tribal organization, immediately rescind a contract or grant and resume control or operation of a program, activity, or service if he finds that there is an immediate threat to safety and, in such cases, shall hold a hearing on such action within ten days thereof. Such Secretary may decline to enter into a new contract or grant agreement and retain control of such program, activity, or service until such time as he is satisfied that the violations of rights or endangerment of health, safety, or welfare which necessitated the rescission has been corrected. Nothing in this section shall be construed as contravening the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (84 Stat. 1590), as amended (29 U.S.C. 651).

EFFECT ON EXISTING RIGHTS

(1) affecting, modifying, diminishing, or otherwise impairing the sovereign immunity from suit enjoyed by an Indian tribe; or

(2) authorizing or requiring the termination of any existing trust responsibility of the United States with respect to the Indian people.

TITLE II—THE INDIAN EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT

SEC. 201. This title may be cited as the "Indian Education Assistance Act".

PART A—EDUCATION OF INDIANS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

SEC. 202. The Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior shall not enter into any contract for the education of Indians unless the prospective contractor has submitted to, and has had approved by the Secretary of the Interior, an education plan, which plan, in the determination of the Secretary, contains educational objectives which adequately address the educational needs of the Indian students who are to be beneficiaries of the contract and assures that the contract is capable of meeting such objectives: Provided, That where students other than Indian students participate in such programs, money expended under such contract shall be prorated to cover the participation of only the Indian students.

"SEC. 5. (a) Whenever a school district affected by a contract or contracts for the education of Indians pursuant to this Act has a local school board not composed of a majority of Indians, the parents of the Indian children enrolled in the school or schools affected by such contract or contracts shall elect a local committee from among their number. Such committee shall fully participate in the development of, and shall have the authority to approve or disapprove programs to be conducted under such contract or contracts, and shall carry out such other duties, and be so structured, as the Secretary of the Interior shall by regulation provide: Provided, however, That, whenever a local Indian committee or committees established pursuant to section 305(b)(2) (B)(ii) of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235) or an Indian advisory school board or boards established pursuant to this Act prior to the date of enactment of this section exists in such school district, such committee or board may, in the discretion of the affected tribal governing body or bodies, be utilized for the purposes of this section.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, revoke any contract if the contractor fails to permit a local committee to perform its duties pursuant to subsection (a).

"SEC. 6. Any school district educating Indian students who are members of recognized Indian tribes, who do not normally reside in the State in which such school district is located, and who are residing in Federal boarding facilities for the purposes of attending public schools within such district may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be reimbursed by him for the full per capita costs of educating such Indian students."

SEC. 203. After conferring with persons competent in the field of Indian education, the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall prepare and submit to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives not later than October 1, 1975, a report which shall include—

December 19, 1974

(1) a comprehensive analysis of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, including—

(A) factors determining the allocation of funds for the special or supplemental educational programs of Indian students and current operating expenditures;

(B) the relationship of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended, to—

(i) title I of the Act of September 20, 1950 (64 Stat. 1100), as amended; and

(ii) the Act of April 11, 1965 (79 Stat. 27), as amended; and

(iii) title IV of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235); and

(iv) the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended;

(2) a specific program to meet the special educational needs of Indian children who attend public schools. Such program shall include, but need not be limited to, the following:

(A) a plan for the equitable distribution of funds to meet the special or supplemental educational needs of Indian children and, where necessary, to provide general operating expenditures to schools and school districts educating Indian children; and

(B) an estimate of the cost of such program;

(3) detailed legislative recommendations to implement the program prepared pursuant to clause (2); and

(4) a specific program, together with detailed legislative recommendations, to assist the development and administration of Indian-controlled community colleges.

PART B—SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

SEC. 204. (a) The Secretary is authorized to enter into a contract or contracts with any State education agency or school district for the purpose of assisting such agency or district in the acquisition of sites for, or the construction, acquisition, or renovation of facilities (including all necessary equipment) in school districts on or adjacent to or in close proximity to any Indian reservation or other lands held in trust by the United States for Indians, if such facilities are necessary for the education of Indians residing on any such reservation or lands.

(b) The Secretary may expend not less than 75 per centum of such funds as are authorized and appropriated pursuant to this part B on those projects which meet the eligibility requirements under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended. Such funds shall be allocated on the basis of existing funding priorities, if any, established by the United States Commissioner of Education under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950, as amended. The United States Commissioner of Education is directed to submit to the Secretary, at the beginning of each fiscal year, commencing with the first full fiscal year after the date of enactment of this Act, a list of those projects eligible for funding under subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950, as amended.

(c) The Secretary may expend not more than 25 per centum of such funds as may be authorized and appropriated pursuant to this part on any school eligible to receive funds under section 208 of this Act.

(d) Any contract entered into by the Secretary pursuant to this section shall contain provisions requiring the relevant State educational agency to—

(1) provide Indian students attending any such facilities constructed, acquired, or renovated, in whole or in part, from funds made available pursuant to this section with standards of education not less than those provided non-Indian students in the school district in which the facilities are situated; and

(2) meet with respect to such facilities, the requirements of the State and local building codes, and other building standards set by the State educational agency or school district for other public school facilities under its jurisdiction or control by the local government in the jurisdiction within which the facilities are situated.

(e) The Secretary shall consult with the entity designated pursuant to section 5 of the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended by this Act, and with the governing body of any Indian tribe or tribes the educational opportunity for the members of which will be significantly affected by any contract entered into pursuant to this section. Such consultation shall be advisory only, but shall occur prior to the entering into of any such contract. The foregoing provisions of this subsection shall not be applicable where the application for a contract pursuant to this section is submitted by an elected school board of which a majority of its members are Indians.

(f) Within ninety days following the expiration of the three-year period following the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall evaluate the effectiveness of the program pursuant to this section and transmit a report of such evaluation of the Congress. Such report shall include—

(1) an analysis of construction costs and the impact on such costs of the provisions of subsection (f) of this section and the Act of March 3, 1921 (46 Stat. 1491), as amended;

(2) a description of the working relationship between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare including any memorandum of understanding in connection with the acquisition of data pursuant to subsection (b) of this section;

(3) projections of the Secretary of future construction needs of the public schools serving Indian children residing on or adjacent to Indian reservations;

(4) a description of the working relationship of the Department of the Interior with local or State educational agencies in connection with the contracting for construction, acquisition, or renovation of school facilities pursuant to this section, and

(5) the recommendations of the Secretary with respect to the transfer of the responsibility for administering subsections (a) and (b) of section 14 of the Act of September 23, 1950 (72 Stat. 548), as amended, from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to the Department of the Interior.

(g) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section, there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $35,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975; $35,000,000 for each of the four succeeding fiscal years; and thereafter, such sums as may be necessary, all of such sums to remain available until expended.

PART C—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 205. No funds from any grant or contract pursuant to this title shall be made available to any school district unless the Secretary is satisfied that the quality and standard of education, including facilities and auxiliary services, for Indian students enrolled in the school of such district are at least equal to that provided all other students from resources, other than resources provided in this title available to the local school district.

SEC. 206. No funds from any contract or grant pursuant to this title shall be made available by any Federal agency directly to other than public agencies and Indian tribes, institutions, and organizations: Provided, That school districts, State education agencies, and Indian tribes, institutions, and organizations assisted by this title may use funds provided herein to contract for necessary services with any appropriate individual, organization, or corporation.

SEC. 207. (a) (1) Within six months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall, to the extent practicable, consult with national and regional Indian organizations with experiences in Indian education to consider and formulate appropriate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(2) Within seven months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall present the proposed rules and regulations to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

(3) Within eight months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall publish proposed rules and regulations in the Federal Register for the purpose of receiving comments from interested parties.

(4) Within ten months from the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations to implement the provisions of this title.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to revise and amend any rules or regulations promulgated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section: Provided, That prior to any revision or amendment to such rules or regulations the Secretary shall, to the extent practicable, consult with appropriate national and regional Indian organizations, and shall publish any proposed revisions in the Federal Register not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of such rules and regulations in order to provide adequate notice to, and receive comments from, other interested parties.

SEC. 208. The Secretary is authorized and directed to provide funds, pursuant to this Act; the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596), as amended; or any other authority granted to him to any tribe or tribal organization which controls and manages any previously private school. The Secretary shall transmit annually to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate and House of Representatives a report on the educational assistance program conducted pursuant to this section.

SEC. 209. The assistance provided in this Act for the education of Indians in the public schools of any State is in addition and supplemental to assistance provided under title IV of the Act of June 23, 1972 (86 Stat. 235).

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to provide maximum Indian participation in the Government and education of the Indian people; to provide for the full participation of Indian tribes in programs and services conducted by the Federal Government for Indians and to encourage the development of human resources of the Indian people; to establish a program of assistance to upgrade Indian education; to support the right of Indian citizens to control their own educational activities; and for other purposes."

Mr. MEEDS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered as read and printed in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection. The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I bring to the floor for passage what I consider to be one of the most significant bills in Indian affairs since enactment of the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934.

December 19, 1974

Down through the years of formulation of this Nation's policy on Indian affairs and in the administration of that policy, we have fostered and supported a colonial government on Indian reservations in the form of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and its programs and services.

While many of us here in the Congress, both now and in the past, have called for a final solution to the Indian problem and demanded that Indians be made "first-class" citizens, we have never permitted the Indian tribes and Indian people to gain the necessary experience of controlling and operating the programs and services which will decide their destiny.

The paternalism of our policies has frustrated, rather than facilitated, the development of Indian managerial and governmental experience and skills.

Governmental policies encouraging outside development of Indian resources have frustrated, rather than facilitated, the growth of Indian self-determination, self-government, and self-sufficiency.

The early attempts of the Congress and the administration in the 1930's to bring about the restoration of tribal self-government and move toward Indian self-sufficiency within the trust relationship through the Indian Reorganization Act were all too shortlived.

Without giving this policy adequate time to bear fruit, Congress moved into the disastrous policy of termination, ending the trust relationship and the programs and services of the Federal Government for Indian tribes. I fervently hope that our passage this Congress of the Menominee Restoration Act has totally repudiated this policy.

S. 1017, as amended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, will provide the necessary administrative machinery to permit tribes to assume the control and operation of Federal programs and services carried out for their reservation for their benefit.

Title I of the bill clarifies and expands the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of HEW in the case of the Indian health service, to contract with Indian tribes and tribal organizations to operate federally funded programs on the reservations.

The restrictive contracting and procurement laws of the Federal Government, particularly the requirement for competitive bidding, are either waived or made more flexible to facilitate such contracting.

Grants to prospective tribal contractors are authorized to develop their ability to administer such contracts.

Various Interior Department and General Accounting Office recommendations for amendments were adopted by our committee. These amendments have tightened up the bill's provisions on contracting in the areas of auditing and reporting, criminal penalties for misuse of contract funds, advance payment of contract funds, and applicability of the wage and labor standards of the Davis-Bacon Act.

In addition, departmental amendments were adopted which permit Federal employees transferring to tribal employment under such contracts to retain earned civil service benefits to facilitate contracting.

In title II, the committee struck, at the recommendation of the Department of the Interior, four authorized Indian education programs in the area of training of Indian professionals; youth internships; educational research and development; and special educational programs. While these are very desirable programs, the committee accepted the administration's argument that they were already authorized or duplicative. We expect the Secretary to provide us with a report on his activity in these areas.

Committee amendments to the entire bill have eliminated $223,750,000 in authorization for new programs. Again, we feel that these funds and programs are vitally needed, but have relied on the statements of the Department that they either exist or are duplicative.

Mr. Speaker, as amended, this bill will go far to resolving the Indian problems and place again in their hands the control of their own future and their own development.

I urge its enactment. The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include extraneous matter, on the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 40, White House Conference on Library and Information Services, agreed to earlier today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 356, CONSUMER PRODUCT WARRANTY AND FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 356) to provide disclosure standards for written consumer product warranties against defect or malfunction; to define Federal content standards for such warranties; to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act in order to improve its consumer protection activities; and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of December 16, 1974.)

Mr. MOSS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be considered as read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. Moss).

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I urge support of the conference report on S. 356, the Magnuson-Moss Warranty-Federal Trade Commission Improvement Act. This is one of the most important pieces of consumer legislation that will be considered by the 93d Congress. It and similar bills to make consumer product warranties meaningful and enforceable and to improve the consumer protection capabilities of the Federal Trade Commission have been pending in the last three Congresses. The legislation has had extensive comment from business groups, consumers, Government agencies, and others. It is now a balanced piece of legislation which emphasizes increased consumer protection and basic fairness to those subject to its provisions. I believe it is fair to say that S. 356 has broad support from both consumers and business.

Title I is similar to the House bill. It applies to warranties given on "consumer products" but does not require any one to give a warranty. Where a warranty is given, the bill authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to make rules insuring adequate and clear disclosure. The conference report requires that written warranties on most consumer products be designated as either "full" or "limited" warranties. In the case of "full" warranties, a seller would have to meet minimum Federal standards which include refund, repair or replacement of a defective or malfunctioning product within a reasonable time and without charge to the consumer.

Title I also prohibits the disclaimer of implied common law warranties when full or limited warranties or service contracts are given in writing. In the case of a limited warranty, however, a seller could limit the duration of implied warranties to the period of the warranty, provided the limitation was conspicuously disclosed.

Title I also gives congressional endorsement to the establishment of informal dispute settlement procedures, with the participation of independent or governmental entities. The Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General would enforce the warranty title and would be empowered to obtain injunctive relief against any person violating its provisions or issuing deceptive warranties.

In addition, any person damaged by the failure of a supplier to comply with a warranty or service contract could bring suit in a Federal or State court giving the warrantor an opportunity to cure the breach. In order that such a suit be brought in a Federal district court, the amount in controversy would have to exceed $50,000 and each individual claim would have to exceed $25. The report authorizes class actions, provided these conditions are met and also where there are at least 100 named plaintiffs notwithstanding any restrictions on such actions which might exist under general principles of Federal law.

Title II of the legislation deals with improvement of the powers of the Federal Trade Commission.

Section 201 expands the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission to matters in or affecting commerce. Both the Senate and House bills contained this provision.

Section 202 clarifies the power of the Federal Trade Commission to issue substantive trade regulation rules defining with specificity acts or practices which are unfair or deceptive to consumers and others under section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The section then establishes procedures designed to insure that Commission proceedings for the issuance of such rules will benefit from the input of all interested persons and from submission of relevant data and information. Where the Commission determines it is appropriate and necessary for a full and true disclosure of disputed issues of material fact, there may be cross-examination either by interested persons or by the Commission on behalf of such persons. Judicial review is, of course, provided for all Commission rules.

Section 202 directs bank regulatory agencies to issue regulations substantially similar to regulations of the Federal Trade Commission, unless the Federal Reserve Board makes certain findings that such regulations would conflict with monetary policy or that the acts or practices in question are not deceptive.

Section 203 clarifies that the investigative authority of the Federal Trade Commission extends to persons, partnerships, or corporations.

Section 204 clarifies certain provisions of the Alaska pipeline bill regarding representation of the Commission in court. The Commission is authorized to represent itself in actions seeking injunctive relief, relating to consumer redress, to obtain judicial review of a rule or order, and in certain other situations. In all other cases, the Commission must give the Attorney General 45-days notice—increased from 10 days under the Alaska pipeline bill—and thereafter may represent itself only if the Attorney General fails to take the action requested by the Commission. In addition, if the Attorney General declines to appeal a case where the Commission represented itself in the lower courts, the Commission is authorized to appear before the Supreme Court and to represent itself. The Attorney General may also appear on behalf of the United States.

Section 205 authorizes the Commission to bring actions for civil penalties for knowing violations of rules or orders it has issued.

Section 206 is quite significant. It authorizes the Commission to bring civil actions in order to obtain redress for consumers and others who have been injured by violations of existing Commission trade rules, or by persons violating the act, resulting in a cease-and-desist order where a reasonable man would have known under the circumstances that the acts or practices were dishonest or fraudulent.

Section 207 provides for authorization of appropriations for the Federal Trade Commission not to exceed $42 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, $46 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1976, and $50 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1977.

I would like to call the attention of the Members to one additional matter. Section 202 of the act—page 40241—provides for judicial review of trade regulation rules of the Commission. After reviewing the conference report, it was the unanimous opinion of the conferees that the standard of review set forth in section 18e(3)(A) should be clarified. The Standard for Judicial Review now found in the conference report provides that the court shall set aside any Commission rule on certain grounds specified in the Administrative Procedure Act and also if "the court finds that the Commission's findings and conclusions, with regard to disputed issues of material fact on which the rule is based, are not supported by substantial evidence in the rulemaking record taken as a whole."

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Broyhill). In so doing, Mr. Speaker, I want to say I have the strongest regard for the gentleman for his vigorous support and the very active role he has played in making it possible for this legislation to reach this floor.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Broyhill).

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference agreement on S. 356, the Consumer Product Warranty and Federal Trade Commission Improvement Act. While there are some matters in the agreement which I did not support and on which I continue to have concern regarding their wisdom, I believe that on the whole we reached an agreement which I can recommend to my colleagues.

The conference agreement contains two titles as did the House bill. Title I of the conference report applies to warranties which are given on consumer products. The provisions of title I of the conference report are substantially the same as the provisions of title I as passed by the House. Summarized briefly, the provisions of title I would do the following:

First, authorize the Federal Trade Commission to issue rules requiring that the terms and conditions of written warranties be fully and conspicuously disclosed in simple and readily understood language. These provisions would apply only to warranties on consumer products actually costing more than $5.

Second, require that all written warranties be clearly designated as "full" or "limited" warranties. In order for a warranty to be designated as a "full" warranty, it must incorporate the Federal minimum standards for warranty. If the Federal minimum standards are not incorporated in a warranty, it must be designated as a "limited" warranty.

Third, establish Federal minimum standards for "full" written warranties. These standards would:

a. Require replacement or repair of the product within a reasonable time without charge.

b. Prohibit any limitation on the duration of implied warranties.

c. May not exclude or limit consequential damages for breach of such written warranty unless such exclusion or limitation conspicuously appears on the face of the warranty, and

d. Require that if a warranted product or component part thereof is not repaired after a reasonable number of attempts (as determined by the FTC by rule), the consumer be given the choice of a refund or replacement of such product or component part thereof.

Fourth, encourage warrantors to establish procedures for settling consumer disputes through informal dispute settlement mechanisms and require that the consumer must first resort to the procedures established before commencing a civil action in a court of law.

Fifth, allow class actions in Federal courts under certain circumstances for actions for breach of warranty. There are different requirements imposed by the law before a class can be formed:

a. Individual claims must be $25 or more;

b. The total value must be $50,000 or more;

c. There must be at least 100 named plaintiffs;

d. A class of consumers may not proceed in a class action, except to the extent the court determines necessary to establish the representative capacity of the named plaintiffs, unless the warrantor is afforded a reasonable opportunity to cure the breach of warranty.

It would be my interpretation of the Eisen case that the plaintiffs must make a reasonable attempt to notify all potential members of the class.

DEFINITION OF REFUND

The term "refund" is defined in title I as "refunding the actual purchase price—less reasonable depreciation based on actual use where permitted by rules of the Commission. The intent of the conferees is that the warrantor be allowed to deduct reasonable depreciation where the consumer has enjoyed use of the product prior to obtaining a refund. Any different result could well constitute an inequity in many circumstances. For this reason, it was not intended that the Commission could prohibit deduction for reasonable depreciation by merely failing to issue rules in this regard. We expect the Commission to issue such rules in the near future and thereby inform both warrantors and consumers of the circumstances in which deduction for depreciation will be allowed.

While title I is for the most part fully operative by its own terms, I would like to make one point clear. Nothing in this act would grant to the Commission the authority to require the giving of a warranty on a consumer product, under any circumstances.

AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL TRADE ACT

Title II of this legislation amends the Federal Trade Act in several respects. An extremely important aspect of this title is that it establishes a clear set of rights for persons in the new procedures the FTC is required to follow in promulgating rules defining unfair or deceptive acts or practices. These procedures, together with a provision authorizing the FTC to seek consumer redress for rule violations form the heart of the added consumer protection afforded by the bill.

The rulemaking provision embodies two important principles. First, it provides that rules promulgated by the FTC pursuant to the bill will have the force and effect of law. Second, because of the new significance of FTC rules, the bill imposes certain new standards in FTC rulemaking proceedings to assure that all premises for these rules—which will have a potentially pervasive and deep effect—are soundly based. We have taken pains, however, to introduce flexibility into both principles.

PRESENT FTC RULEMAKING AUTHORITY

For a number of years, the FTC issued rules defining acts or practices deemed unfair or deceptive to consumers. During this period, there were continuing assertions that the FTC did not possess substantive rulemaking authority, and that any rules it issued had only the effect of being a guideline to industries.

In the Octane Rating case, the court held that the Federal Trade Act did confer authority to the FTC to issue substantive rules defining both unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices to consumers. Under this interpretation, the FTC has the authority to issue substantive rules which may affect an entire industry and, in some cases, a great number of industries. However, the act is silent regarding the procedural requirements to be followed in issuing these rules; therefore, those persons immediately and seriously affected by such rules have no procedural rights before the agency except the informal rulemaking procedure set by the Administrative Procedures Act. Thus, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee determined that the Federal Trade Commission Act should be amended to provide adequate procedural safeguards for those affected by the Commission's rules. In our judgement, more effective, workable, and meaningful rules will be promulgated if persons affected by such rules have an opportunity, by cross-examination and rebuttal evidence, to challenge the factual assumptions on which the agency is proceeding and to show in what respect such assumptions are erroneous.

NEW FTC RULEMAKING PROCEDURES

With respect to the new procedural safeguards for factfinding, we have not turned rulemaking proceedings into adjudicatory proceedings as those terms have been traditionally understood under the Administrative Procedures Act. Rather, we have tried to develop a wholly new type of proceeding designed to balance the need to test the premises of proposed FTC rules with the obvious need to grant the FTC the power to expedite proceedings and avoid being tied up by trial-type tactics. First, there is a right to cross-examination and submission of rebuttal evidence for the proceedings, but the right is limited to disputed issues of material fact. We have provided in appropriate cases that cross-examination be conducted by a representative of a group to enable the Commission to speed up a proceeding where there is a likelihood of substantial delay. We have also—in a wholly unique provision—specifically authorized the Commission to conduct cross-examination for those persons who may not have counsel or who may not wish to ask questions themselves. Thus the right to cross-examination is far from absolute, and much less extensive than it would be in a typical adjudicatory proceeding. We are quite frankly relying in this area on two factors: the commonsense and fairness of the FTC, and, of course, the review function of the courts, which are not to affirm rules if, among other things, the FTC's handling of rebuttal evidence and cross-examination has prevented full disclosure of material issues of fact and thus prevented a fair determination of the entire proceedings.

WAIVER AUTHORITY

The provision that grants rules the force and effect of law is also not absolute. The rulemaking authority contains an exemption provision pursuant to which persons may seek waiver of a rule because in their circumstances, application of the rule would be unreasonable or unnecessary in light of the purposes of the rule. While we intend that the agency and the courts would, of course, always have authority to apply waiver doctrines where appropriate in an enforcement case, this exemption provision gives additional flexibility to the rules by permitting some persons to seek exceptions in advance.

ANTITRUST RULEMAKING AUTHORITY NOT INTENDED

The rulemaking provision, I might add, does not affect any authority the FTC might have to promulgate rules which respect to "unfair methods of competition" including, of course, antitrust prohibitions. I myself do not believe that the FTC has any such authority. I am advised that there is a passing reference in the appellate court decision in the Octane Posting case, to the effect that the FTC may have some kind of authority to issue some kind of antitrust rules. But the case, of course, did not deal with antitrust rules. Antitrust rules would obviously have a far more pervasive effect than rules defining unfair or deceptive acts or practices, and I would feel very uncomfortable giving such antitrust rules the same effect as this bill gives consumer practice rules. Accordingly, we have made clear that the new bill does not deal with the antitrust laws.

CONSUMER REDRESS

The rulemaking authority's "bite" in this new legislation derives from the consumer redress and civil penalties provisions, which may come into play in appropriate cases of rule violations, as well as in other clearly defined circumstances. The consumer redress provision, as a whole, is a significant advance in consumer protection, for it, together with the carefully drafted class action provisions in title I, should provide an answer to the multifaceted and perennial problem of class actions. In part because of my objections, a similar consumer redress provision was defeated on the floor of the House. I was initially opposed to the addition of such a provision in conference because it was being added without an opportunity for hearings to permit the public to be heard and without full recognition of what we were doing to clearly spell out the authority of the FTC to seek consumer redress. However, I acceded to the provision finally adopted because it seeks to provide protections against unfairness and is aimed at making whole those consumers who actually show injury from a rule violation or knowingly dishonest and fraudulent practices.

CIVIL PENALTIES

One aspect of the civil penalties provision deserves comment because the idea involved is a relatively new one. The penalty provisions permit the FTC, after it has obtained a cease-and-desist order, to go into court to obtain civil penalties for the conduct subject to the order if it was engaged in with actual knowledge that the conduct was unfair or deceptive and in violation of section 5. Sometimes, in dealing with a joint scheme, the Commission will proceed against only some of the persons involved in the joint action. We have added a new provision which will now enable the FTC to seek civil penalties in court against the other persons involved in the scheme but not technically parties to the initial FTC proceeding and thus not technically subject to the cease-and-desist order. I might add, of course, that these persons will be entitled to their day in court before being assessed with penalties, and for that reason are granted a de novo trial on all factual issues in the penalty action.

SELF REPRESENTATION IN THE COURTS

The conference report contains one provision that gives me a good deal of concern. That provision is the one that grants to the Federal Trade Commission the authority to represent itself through its own attorneys in the Supreme Court under certain circumstances. This provision was added to the conference report despite great expressions of concern from the chief legal officers of the United States, the Attorney General, former Solicitor General Ervin Griswold, and all nine justices of the Supreme Court. What other expertise could we possibly draw from? I would like to caution my colleagues that if we allow this type erosion of the Solicitor General's authority to continue, we will fragment what has traditionally been a central authority designed to coordinate a uniform position for Federal Government litigation.

CONCLUSION

All in all, I believe the bill represents a reasonable compromise between the Senate and House versions and a responsible piece of legislation. It completes the FTC reform begun with the amendments to the Alaska pipeline bill, and these two bills together constitute an important new consumer protection measure for which we should all feel proud.

December 19, 1974

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ECKHARDT) such time as he may consume.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) has just indicated, we are establishing a new category somewhere between the adjudicatory and the rule-making process of the present Administrative Procedures Act, and I think it is very important that we clearly understand exactly what we are doing.

There is a provision on page 33 of the report which states that—

If the Commission determines (1) that there are disputed issues of material fact, and (2) that it is necessary to resolve such issues, interested persons would be entitled to present such rebuttal submissions and to conduct (or have conducted by the Commission) such cross-examination of persons commenting orally as the Commission determines to be appropriate and required for a full and true disclosure with respect to such issues. The only disputed issues of material fact to be determined for resolution by the Commission are those issues characterized as issues of specific fact in contrast to legislative fact.

I point out the word "orally," and I wish to find out if the gentleman from California (Mr. Moss) feels that that language is exclusive, or merely descriptive of the section dealing with oral presentation.

Mr. MOSS. It is the intent and the understanding of the gentleman from California that the words "commenting orally" were intended to be descriptive, and not limiting. In other words, the Commission could authorize cross-examination of written submissions if it determined that it was appropriate.

Mr. ECKHARDT. For instance, if the Commission should rely, in making a rule on a written report of one of its agents and cross-examination of that agent is necessary for fair determination of the rulemaking procedure taken as a whole, the Commission should make that agent available for cross-examination. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MOSS. The gentleman is indeed correct.

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I concur in the gentleman's interpretation.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Each of us was on the conference committee, and I understand that to be in accord both with the language and with the discussions there; is that not correct?

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, the civil penalties provision for violations of section 5 of the FTC Act (section 205) of S. 356 requires proof of a defendant's knowledge of the illegality of his conduct before penalties can be imposed. This means that penalties cannot be imposed if a defendant, in good faith, believes that his conduct is permissible. His belief may be based on lack of knowledge of the law, or on a reasonable judgment that his circumstances are different from those to whom an order or rule may apply, or indeed on the view, held in good faith, that his conduct is defensible under the FTC Act for any reason. The penalties provision thus does not convert FTC action applicable to someone else, or a mere complaint against the defendant himself, into knowledge of illegality. The reason is clear: No person should ever have to pay for the right to his day in court to defend his own conduct by being compelled to assume a risk of a $10,000 per day penalty should he ultimately lose. On the other hand, it is not the intent of the Congress to establish a system to encourage court challenges merely for the purpose of thwarting the FTC or delaying its legitimate objections to illegal practices under provisions of the FTC Act.

Mr. MOSS. Do any other members of the committee at this time seek recognition?

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused. So the conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 1180, SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1975

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the House joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1180) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagrees to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. MAHON, WHITTEN, BOLAND, FLOOD, SLACK, CEDERBERG, MICHEL, and WYATT.

FURTHER LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. O'NEILL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the following announcement.

We had scheduled for today the chrome bill next. By mutual agreement of both sides on this issue, it will be eliminated from the schedule, and it will not be brought up for the remainder of the session. It will be scheduled sometime early in the 94th Congress.

AUTHORIZING A TECHNICAL CORRECTION IN THE ENROLLMENT OF S. 356

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 126) authorizing a technical correction in the enrollment of S. 356, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution as follows:

S. Con. Res. 126

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed, in the enrollment of S. 356, An Act to provide disclosure standards for written consumer product warranties against defect or malfunction; to define Federal content standards for such warranties; to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act in order to improve its consumer protection activities, and for other purposes, to make the following technical correction:

Section 18(e)(3)(A), as inserted by section 202(a) of the Conference Report on such bill, is amended to read as follows:

"(A) the court finds that the Commission's action is not supported by substantial evidence in the rulemaking record (as defined in paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection) taken as a whole, or"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I indicated at the time of my statement on the conference report that I intended to offer this essential resolution in order to clarify an understanding of the conferees. We feel that the standard of review could be better expressed as follows:

The court shall hold unlawful and set aside the rule on certain grounds specified in the Administrative Procedures Act or

And now I quote from the resolution—if—the court finds that the Commission's action is not supported by substantial evidence in the rule-making record (as defined in paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection) taken as a whole, or

This, Mr. Speaker, is strictly to clarify and make very clear the intent of the conferees and to do it through the concurrent resolution so that there will be no possibility of error.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BROYHILL.

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to clarify the language in the conference report, not because of any disagreement among the conferees but because of some legal interpretation of the language which was included in the conference report. We want to make crystal clear that any rules that are issued by the commission must be based upon the substantial evidence that is developed in the consideration of the rule. That is the purpose of the amendment—to clarify the provision in the Judicial Review section.

Mr. MOSS. I thank the gentleman.

December 19, 1974

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the Senate concurrent resolution just concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

WAR CLAIMS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 1728) to increase benefits provided to American civilian internees in Southeast Asia, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there a printed report?

Mr. ECKHARDT. There is.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object I take this time to ask if there is anything in the conference report that is not germane.

Mr. ECKHARDT. No, there is not.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of December 17, 1974.)

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Speaker, on August 12, 1974 the House passed amendments to the War Claims Act of 1948 to increase benefits provided to American civilian internees in Southeast Asia and for other purposes. The House language differed from the Senate and a conference was needed. The conference report has been filed and it is a good report. It reflects the give and take that one expects in a conference between two bodies.

I will summarize briefly the recommended solution. First, both the Senate bill and the House amendment increased the authorized detention benefits for American civilians during the Vietnam conflict from $60 per month to $150 per month in order to raise the benefits for civilians to the same level presently authorized for military personnel. The conference substitute retains this provision.

Second, the House amendment would have eliminated the priority in existing law for all unpaid award holders, both individual and corporate, up to $35,000. The conference substitute retains this priority under which $11,000 has already been paid to each award holder. Therefore, $24,000 or the unpaid balance of each remaining award, whichever is less, will be paid under this priority.

Since each corporate award holder will receive up to $24,000 under this provision, the language in the House amendment providing an additional priority for payments to corporate award holders up to $50,000 was omitted from the conference substitute.

Third, the House amendment would have created a priority for all individual awards up to $500,000. The conference substitute creates a priority for individual awards up to $250,000. The conferees agreed that the equitable considerations favoring a priority for the payment of remaining individual awards would be adequately recognized by the priority adopted in the conference substitute. The balance of amounts in the war claims fund will then be used to make pro rata payments on the remaining individual and corporate awards.

While this legislation was pending in the House, the Department of Justice was requested to refrain from certifying funds for distribution to the war claims fund until this Congress completed action on S. 1728. The Department agreed to this request. It is my understanding that certain funds are now ready to be certified by the Department of Justice for distribution to the war claims fund, and it is also my hope that this transfer and any future transfers will be accomplished as soon as possible upon enactment of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the conference report reflects a reasonable resolution of the differences in the Senate and House measures. It will provide an equitable solution for the payment of the remaining awards from the war claims fund. I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL).

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in support of the conference report.

Members will recall when the bill was before the House, the issue was, are we going to give priority to individual claimants to the war claims funds and, if so, how much that priority would be in terms of dollars?

The conference report says we are giving priority to claims of individual persons up to $250,000 and then those other claimants, including corporations, would share on a pro rata basis in the balance of the fund.

I think it is a good compromise. It is, in my opinion, a better bill than when it left the House. Although I do still disagree with the principle of giving individuals this preference, as we have done here, at least we have a better bill than when it left the House.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ECKHARDT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL).

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report on S. 1782, just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL RAILROAD SAFETY ACT OF 1970 AND HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION CONTROL ACT OF 1970

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 15223) to amend the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 and the Hazardous Materials Transportation Control Act of 1970 to authorize additional appropriations, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of December 13, 1974.)

Mr. JARMAN (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the statement be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, the House and Senate conferees held three lengthy sessions to iron out differences between their respective versions of H.R. 15223. I believe we have brought to the floor a product which is much better than the bills either House produced.

The bill is called the Transportation Safety Act of 1974, and deals with the problems of railroad and aviation accidents, and with the matter of transporting hazardous materials by any mode of transportation.

Title I is the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act. The conferees consolidated the many faceted jurisdictions within the executive branch over hazardous materials transportation into the office of the Secretary of Transportation. He and he alone will have regulatory powers involving the carriage of hazardous materials. We also ban radioactive materials from passenger aircraft, unless it is necessary for use in research or medical activity. We see no need to submit unsuspecting passengers to the perils of potentially dangerous materials. We have put some teeth in this new legislation by making civil and criminal penalties for violations of regulations quite severe.

Title II is the Rail Safety Improvement Act of 1974. The conferees adopted the House-passed provisions with minor changes.

Title III is the Independent Safety Board Act. The House did not have a similar provision, but we agreed with the Senate on the necessity of an independent National Transportation Safety Board. We felt, like the Senate, that if we wanted to have expanded emphasis on transportation safety, we would have to have a board free from the influences of other Government agencies. This is particularly true in the field of surface transportation safety. At present the National Transportation Safety Board is a part of the Department of Transportation, and most of the surface accidents involving railroads and trucks are investigated by the Federal Railroad Administration and the Federal Highway Administration. We want the new independent Board to be much more involved in those areas—particularly in passenger train accidents.

We stripped the Senate bill of an attempt to terminate the present chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, and we will have no part of efforts to change the composition of the new Board. We feel that the Board will be responsive to the public's need with their new independence. We did make a change as a concession to the Senate—and that involved requiring at least two members of the Board to have certain technical and professional background qualifications, but we do not require or intend for the full Board to be named on such a basis, because we felt to do so might stack the Board with industry-oriented people who may not allow the public interest to prevail in their decisions.

I recommend this conference report to the House as a good bill, one which will improve safety in all modes of transportation, and one which is sorely needed.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. KUYKENDALL).

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the record, I want to compliment the chairman of the subcommittee for this conference report and point out that there is one area in which the Senate had a major change and we accepted what I think was a meaningful compromise and that is the makeup of the National Transportation Safety Board.

The Senate passed and required technical qualifications for all five members of the Board. The compromise said that such technical or managerial obligations apply to two members of that Board.

Would the gentleman care to comment on the meaning of that compromise on the qualifications?

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, the intent is that we only intend to have two members with technical qualifications.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Is it not true that the additional managerial term would also basically qualify any member of the present Board, if the President should choose to reappoint?

Mr. JARMAN. That is correct.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I have a second question also with reference to the matter of legislative record.

For the first time, Mr. Speaker, we have given the Secretary of Transportation safety responsibility and access to the manufacture of containers. I would also like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee to comment on the point that the component parts of container manufacture of the containers are also covered under the intent of this legislation; for instance, if we have a container of sulphuric acid, the person that makes the seal and the spigot would also be covered; is that not correct?

Mr. JARMAN. That is correct. The gentleman has stated it exactly and the component parts are covered.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a question for the legislative record. The conference committee specifies in section 108, which was in the Senate version and not in the House version of the bill, it is intended to limit the carriage of radioactive materials to those relating to research, medical diagnosis, and therapy.

I assume it is not the purpose of this section to eliminate those items for carriage which contain tiny trace elements or small quantities of radioactive material on scheduled passenger flights, is that correct?

Mr. JARMAN. Yes, the gentleman is correct in his interpretation.

Mr. PICKLE. By way of explanation, I understand there is a possibility the language in section 108 might be interpreted, when the regulations are issued, so that a person could be prohibited from boarding an aircraft because he was wearing a pacemaker in his heart. Would that be true, by application?

Mr. JARMAN. No, that is not the intent.

Mr. PICKLE. I have one other question for clarification. What about automatic fire extinguishers? On most airplanes they are triggered by intense heat. They are operated by small quantities of radioactive materials. This legislation would not prevent that type of extinguisher from being used aboard a plane, would it?

Mr. JARMAN. No, I would say to the gentleman that it would not keep those articles off.

Mr. PICKLE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the conference report. I think the House bill went through practically intact, and I think the chairman of the subcommittee, the chairman of the full committee and members of the staff are to be congratulated for their work on what is a very important bill, particularly in the area of radioactive materials.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments and for his valuable assistance on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING SECTION 510 OF THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 12427), to amend section 510 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask my friend from Michigan if there are any amendments here that are not germane.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, I will say that first of all, all of the amendments save one are germane and are technical in character. There is one amendment which is nongermane, and if the gentleman will permit, I will elaborate.

The bill actually contains two principal sections. The amendments to the Merchant Marine Act already cited allow the trade-in of mariner vessels in the reserve fleet to upgrade both the moving fleet and also upgrade the reserve fleet, which now has reached such a state of deterioration that it is of no value.

The second section is a bill, which was earlier passed by the House as H.R. 12208, passed the House April 2, 1974, overwhelmingly. That, my colleagues will recall, is a minor bill which resolved a jurisdictional problem relating to the port of Sacramento and for the other ports on the west coast.

It resolved a jurisdictional conflict between the ICC, which claimed jurisdiction over portions of water carriage on the west coast, and the Federal Maritime Commission by simply stating that in those instances the jurisdiction will be fixed by Congress as belonging to the Federal Maritime Commission.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, what I understand the gentleman to say then is that the one section that is not germane does include a bill formerly passed by this House?

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out "the Merchant Marine".

Page 1, line 8, strike out "Act, 1936," and insert: "Act".

Page 2, line 8, strike out "vessel[s]" and insert: "vessel".

Page 2, line 9, strike out "vessel[s]" and insert: "vessel".

Sec. 2. (a) The Shipping Act, 1916, as amended (46 U.S.C. 801-842), is amended by inserting a new section 3 to read as follows:

"Sec. 3. Notwithstanding part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 901 et seq.), or any other provision of law, rates and charges for the barging and affreighting of containers or containerized cargo by barge between points in the United States, shall be filed solely with the Federal Maritime Commission in accordance with rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission where (a) the cargo is moving between a point in a foreign country or a noncontiguous State, territory, or possession and a point in the United States, (b) the transportation by barge between points in the United States is furnished by a terminal operator as a service substitute in lieu of a direct vessel call by the common carrier by water transporting the containers, or containerized cargo under a through bill of lading, (c) such terminal operator is a Pacific Slope State, municipality, or other public body or agency subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Maritime Commission, and the only one furnishing the particular circumscribed barge service in question as of the date of enactment hereof, and (d) such terminal operator is in compliance with the rules and regulations of the Federal Maritime Commission for the operation of such barge service. The terminal operator providing such services shall be subject to the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916."

(b) Within one hundred and twenty days after enactment of this Act, the Federal Maritime Commission shall promulgate rules and regulations for the barge operations described in the amendment made by the first section of this Act. Such rules shall provide that the rates charged shall be based upon factors normally considered by a regular commercial operator in the same service.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN A. BLATNIK LOCK

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 17589) to designate the new Poe lock on the Saint Marys River at Sault Sainte Marie, Mich., as the "John A. Blatnik Lock."

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 17589

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the new Poe lock on the Saint Marys River at Sault Sainte Marie, Michigan, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "John A. Blatnik lock". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such lock shall be held to be a reference to the "John A. Blatnik lock".

CXX—2611—Part 31

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GROVER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. JOHNSON) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROVER) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 17589 would name the new Poe lock as the John A. Blatnik Lock, at Sault Sainte Marie, Mich.

This bill came out of the Committee on Public Works unanimously. There was no opposition to it.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct and high privilege for me to rise in support of H.R. 17589 to designate the new Poe lock on the Saint Marys River at Sault Sainte Marie, Mich., as the John A. Blatnik lock in honor of my dear friend and distinguished colleague and chairman of our Public Works Committee.

The new Poe lock is a feature of the project for deepening of the connecting channels in the Great Lakes to depths commensurate with those in the St. Lawrence Seaway. This deepening project has permitted the full utilization of the St. Lawrence Seaway to bring ocean going commerce to all of the Great Lakes.

Congressman JOHN BLATNIK was first elected to the Congress in 1946. He is retiring at the end of this session after 28 years of honorable and distinguished public service to his constituents and to the United States. From the beginning of his service in the Congress he has championed the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway and navigation in the Great Lakes. He was a leading and vital force in bringing about the authorization of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the legislation to deepen and widen the connecting channels of the Great Lakes, opening the ports of the Great Lakes to the trade routes of the world.

Not only did he sponsor both the Seaway and channel deepening legislation, but presided as chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Subcommittee during the construction of the largest of the inter-lakes locks, now named the Poe lock. This lock is on one of the connecting channels—the 63-mile St. Marys River linking the Mesabi Iron Range with the Chicago-Gary industrial complex of Lake Michigan, and measures 1,200 feet in length by 110 feet in width, in contrast to the 860 by 80 feet dimensions of the other locks. This larger size has permitted construction of the superlakers, the enormous 1,000-foot oreboats which carry iron ore and taconite from Lake Superior to the Lake Michigan industrial region. In turn, this larger scale, more economical interlake transport has encouraged the development of domestic sources for the Nation's backbone iron and steel industry, instead of relying, as we might have been forced to, on imports from Labrador.

Congressman BLATNIK has also been a leading advocate of the deepening of the major harbors of the Great Lakes. His efforts have played a significant role in the development and economic and social well-being of a vast part of our Nation which is served by the Great Lakes.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, as well as for his many contributions to the Great Lakes and the Nation, I urge enactment of this legislation honoring this great man.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. GROVER. Mr. Speaker, we have no requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. JOHNSON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 17589.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL CONSERVATION TIME EXTENSION

Mr. BERGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 3943) to extend the time for using funds appropriated to carry out the 1973 rural environmental assistance program and the 1974 rural environmental conservation program.

The Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding any other provision of law or regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, the time within which producers may request and receive approval for cost-sharing assistance under the 1973 Rural Environmental Assistance Program and the 1974 Rural Environmental Conservation Program (as authorized by sections 7 to 15, 16(a), and 17 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, and title X of the Agricultural Act of 1970, as amended) is extended to December 31, 1975, and funds appropriated for such programs shall remain available for making payments to eligible producers until December 31, 1976, for practices carried out during the period July 1, 1972, to December 31, 1975.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. THONE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BERGLAND) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. THONE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BERGLAND).

Mr. BERGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not entail any new money or any new program. It simply extends to December 31, 1975, the time required to complete the conservation practices that have been authorized by law, otherwise scheduled to be completed by December 31, of this year.

December 19, 1974

Mr. Speaker, this problem arose when, in 1973, the administration terminated the 1973 Rural Environmental Assistance program and impounded most of the funds for the program for 1974.

On December 28, 1973, a Federal Court decreed that those impoundments were illegal, and forced their reinstatement.

In April, 1974, the Department of Agriculture announced a conservation program for the 1973 and 1974 authorization. Because of the lateness of the time in which it was announced the farmers of the country did not have time to complete 2 years work in less than 9 months.

Many of the land improvement contractors left the business because they felt the program was terminated. Much of the country was devastated by near record rain fall last spring, not only preventing this installation of badly needed conservation measures, but adding to the conservation needs. As a consequence we find, Mr. Speaker, that $100 million in vitally needed conservation practices will not be completed by the termination date as required by law.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the bill be adopted. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. THONE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota. He and Chairman Poage have been most active in the passage of this needed bill.

Mr. Speaker, to comply with the original intent of Congress, to maintain our precious soil and water resources, and to comply with the court order, the soil conservation program compliance period just must be extended for 1 year as mandated in this legislation.

Urban oriented administrations have paid far too little heed to the need to maintain and expand our on-the-farm programs to conserve water and topsoil. In 1973 the funds were impounded. A Federal court ordered that these funds be invested in conservation during 1974. The program to make available both 1973 and 1974 funds was not announced until late in April 1974. Unsatisfactory weather compounded the problems.

When it appeared that Federal assistance for conservation work was ending in 1973, many contractors went into other specialties or reduced their operations. Then when the programs were reinstated by the courts and 2 years' appropriations were scheduled for 1 year, there were not enough contractors left in the business to do the work—even if the weather had been ideal. Additionally, there is much tillable ground that needs conservation work, but they have made the need for such work even greater.

At this time there is still some $50 million of the 1973 program that has not been committed and about $85 million remaining in the 1974 program. Therefore, to comply with the original intent of Congress, to maintain our precious soil and water resources, and to comply with the court order, the program period must be extended.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BERGLAND) that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 3943.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the Senate bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BERGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

OPPOSING THE GRANTING OF PERMANENT RESIDENCE IN THE UNITED STATES TO CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 1518) opposing the granting of permanent residence in the United States to certain aliens.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object and I do not intend to object, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania briefly explain the nature of the resolution.

Mr. EILBERG. Under section 244 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, several hundred administrative decisions of the Department of Justice granting permanent-resident status to aliens who have been in the United States for a period of 7 years or more are sent to the Congress annually for our review. Unless either body of Congress approves a resolution opposing the granting of permanent residence to such aliens, they will automatically acquire that status upon the adjournment of this Congress. The Immigration Subcommittee has reviewed each of the cases referred and has unanimously agreed that the granting of permanent resident alien status to the six aliens referred to in House Resolution 1518 is not warranted. This resolution has been cleared on both sides of the aisle and I would urge its approval at this time.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman for his explanation and would note that the resolution has been cleared on this side of the aisle and I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for the record I wish to ask if any of the persons referred to in this resolution have a private bill which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary or any such bills now pending in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, the answer is: No.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, is this procedure to expedite the ongoing operations of the Department of Justice, as far as these people are concerned. Is it in any way contrary to whatever action the Attorney General has taken on the question of deportation; does the gentleman know?

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, the answer is no to the gentleman's final question. These aliens have been found to be deportable and the Special Inquiry Officer's decision denying suspension of deportation has been reversed by the Board of Immigration Appeals. We are complying with the law since all of these decisions have been referred to us for approval or disapproval, and there are hundreds of cases in this category. In these six cases however, we believe it would be grossly improper to allow these people to acquire the status of permanent resident aliens.

Mr. WYLIE. In other words, the gentleman has been working with the Attorney General's office?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. WYLIE. This bill then is in fact a confirmation of what the Attorney General intends to do?

Mr. EILBERG. The gentleman is correct insofar as it relates to the determination of deportability which has been made by the Department of Justice in each of these cases.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COPYRIGHT MISCELLANY

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 3976) to amend title 17 of the United States Code to remove the expiration date for a limited copyright in sound recordings, to increase the criminal penalties for piracy and counterfeiting of sound recordings, to extend the duration of copyright protection in certain cases, to establish a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

S. 3976

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—AMEND TITLE 17, UNITED STATES CODE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

SEC. 101. Section 3 of the Act of October 15, 1971 (85 Stat. 391), is amended by striking out "and before January 1, 1975".

SEC. 102. Section 104 of title 17, United States Code, is amended—

December 19, 1974

(1) by striking out "Any person" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), any person"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Any person who willfully and for profit shall infringe any copyright provided by section 1(f) of this title, or who should knowingly and willfully aid or abet such infringement, shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, for the first offense and shall be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both, for any subsequent offense."

SEC. 103. Section 2318 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out all after "fined" and inserting in lieu thereof "not more than $25,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, for the first offense and shall be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both, for any subsequent offense."

SEC. 104. In any case in which the renewal term of copyright subsisting in any work on the date of approval of this bill, or the term thereof as extended by Public Law 87-668, by Public Law 89-142, by Public Law 90-141, by Public Law 90-416, by Public Law 91-147, by Public Law 92-566 (or by all or certain of said laws), would expire prior to December 31, 1976, such term is hereby continued until December 31, 1976.

TITLE II—NATIONAL COMMISSION ON NEW TECHNOLOGICAL USES OF COPYRIGHTED WORKS

ESTABLISHMENT AND PURPOSE OF COMMISSION

SEC. 201. (a) There is hereby created in the Library of Congress a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works (hereafter called the Commission).

(b) The purpose of the Commission is to study and compile data on:

(1) the reproduction and use of copyrighted works of authorship—

(A) in conjunction with automatic systems capable of storing, processing, retrieving, and transferring information; and

(B) by various forms of machine reproduction, not including reproduction by or at the request of instructors for use in face-to-face teaching activities; and

(2) the creation of new works by the application or intervention of such automatic systems or machine reproduction.

(c) The Commission shall make recommendations as to such changes in copyright law or procedures that may be necessary to assure for such purposes access to copyrighted works, and to provide recognition of the rights of copyright owners.

MEMBERSHIP OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 202. (a) The Commission shall be composed of thirteen voting members, appointed as follows:

(1) Four members, to be appointed by the President, selected from authors and other copyright owners;

(2) Four members, to be appointed by the President, selected from users of copyright works;

(3) Four nongovernmental members to be appointed by the President, selected from the public; generally, with at least one member selected from among experts in consumer protection affairs;

(4) The Librarian of Congress.

(b) The President shall appoint a Chairman, and a Vice Chairman who shall act as Chairman in the absence or disability of the Chairman or in the event of a vacancy in that office, from among the four members selected from the public generally, as provided by clause (3) of subsection (a). The Register of Copyrights shall serve ex officio as a nonvoting member of the Commission.

(c) Seven voting members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum.

(d) Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers and shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment was made.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF COMMISSION

SEC. 203. (a) Members of the Commission, other than officers or employees of the Federal Government, shall receive compensation at the rate of $100 per day while engaged in the actual performance of Commission duties, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses in connection with such duties.

(b) Any members of the Commission who are officers or employees of the Federal Government shall serve on the Commission without compensation, but such members shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses in connection with the performance of their duties.

SEC. 204. (a) To assist in its studies, the Commission may appoint a staff which shall be an administrative part of the Library of Congress. The staff shall be headed by an Executive Director, who shall be responsible to the Commission for the Administration of the duties entrusted to the staff.

(b) The Commission may procure temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but at rates not to exceed $100 per day.

EXPENSES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 205. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title until June 30, 1976.

REPORTS

SEC. 206. (a) Within one year after the first meeting of the Commission it shall submit to the President and the Congress a preliminary report on its activities.

(b) Within three years after the enactment of this Act the Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress a final report on its study and investigation which shall include its recommendations and such proposals for legislation and administrative action as may be necessary to carry out its recommendations.

(c) In addition to the preliminary report and final report required by this section, the Commission may publish such interim reports as it may determine, including but not limited to consultant's reports, transcripts of testimony, seminar reports, and other Commission findings.

POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 207. (a) The Commission or, with the authorization of the Commission, any three or more of its members, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title, hold hearings, administer oaths, and require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary material.

(b) With the consent of the Commission, any of its members may hold any meetings, seminars, or conferences considered appropriate to provide a forum for discussion of the problems with which it is dealing.

TERMINATION

SEC. 208. On the sixtieth day after the date of the submission of its final report, the Commission shall terminate and all offices and employment under it shall expire.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Michigan opposed to the bill?

Mr. DINGELL. I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Mr. RAILSBACK. No, I am not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) is opposed to the bill, and the gentleman qualifies.

Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, S. 3976, the bill before the House, which passed the Senate on September 9, 1974, is addressed to three issues, all related to the copyright law. First, it would render permanent the expiring prohibition against piracy of sound recordings and maximum existing imprisonment penalties for willful infringement for profit and for counterfeiting of sound recordings (sections 101, 102, and 103);

Second, it would extend the duration of expiring copyrights in certain cases (section 104), and Third, it would establish a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works (sections 201-208).

PIRACY PROVISIONS

I turn first to the provisions of S. 3976 involving piracy of sound recordings (secs. 101, 102, and 103). These sections, as proposed to be amended, are identical in effect with the provisions of H.R. 13364, as it passed the House on October 7, 1974, and has since been pending in the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. For parliamentary reasons it has now become desirable for the House again to pass the identical provisions—also amended as to penalties—in enacting S. 3976.

The principal purpose of H.R. 13364, like that of sections 101, 102, and 103 of S. 3976, is to eliminate the present January 1, 1975, expiration date from Public Law 92-140, which first gave copyright protection to sound recordings. The measure also makes increases in the penalties for willful infringement for profit of sound recording copyrights and in the penalties for knowing and fraudulent transportation of sound recordings carrying counterfeit labels.

The effect of these provisions would be to render permanent the existing tentative protection of sound recordings and to fix new penalties for willful infringement of sound recordings carrying counterfeit labels. The new penalties would be for a first offense a maximum fine of $25,000 or a maximum of 1 year's imprisonment or both, and for subsequent offenses a maximum fine of $50,000 or a maximum of 2 years' imprisonment or both. Existing penalties call for a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 and imprisonment of not more than 1 year, whether for a first or a subsequent offense.

EXTENSION OF EXPIRING COPYRIGHTS

Section 104 of title 1 of the legislation would extend until December 31, 1976,

the copyright in works now in their second term of copyright and due to expire on December 31, 1974. Copyright in approximately 124,000 works will expire on December 31 of this year unless an interim extension of the term is passed. Of this total, approximately two-thirds of expiring copyrights are musical compositions. The Copyright Office estimates that an additional 13,350 copyrights are due to expire in calendar year 1975 and 15,300 in calendar year 1976. By the end of 1976 the total of copyrights affected by interim extension legislation would be approximately 153,500.

If section 104 is enacted, it will be the ninth in a series of interim extensions of the renewal term of expiring copyrights, which began with Public Law 87-668 in 1962. The first 3-year interim extension was followed by a two-year extension, Public Law 89-142, then by five successive 1-year extensions, Public Laws 90-141, 90-416, 91-147, 91-555, and 92-170, and finally by another 2-year extension, Public Law 92-566, which expires at the end of this year. S. 3976 would add another 2-year extension, ending on December 31, 1976.

The principal justification for the extensions has been the bill for general revision of the copyright law, which would add 19 years to the renewal term of all subsisting copyrights, making a total term of 75 years. In the past, support of these temporary extensions was thought warranted under the view that a total 75-year term for subsisting copyrights was fully justified. As long as the revision bill providing a 75-year term was progressing toward enactment, it was thought undesirable to allow subsisting copyrights to expire while the bill was moving through the necessary legislative process. Families of authors, and in a few instances authors themselves, as well as assignees and successors of assignees are direct beneficiaries of the royalties from the majority of these copyrights, and it seemed drastic to permit their works to fall into the public domain during active legislative consideration of a bill that would definitively extend the term in all subsisting copyrights. It should be noted that in no case would any of these works be given protection longer than the 75-year term which is established as the norm under the revision bill, S. 1361, which passed the Senate on the same day as did S. 3976.

The revision bill became stalled in the Senate because of a dispute over rights in cable television transmissions, an issue completely unrelated to the length of copyright term.

Senate passage of S. 1361 on September 9, 1974, by a margin of 70 to 1, warrants the view that considerable legislative momentum has been regained by the revision project. Indeed the prospect for revision seems brighter than at any time since 1967.

A total of 150,000 copyright properties are caught up in the question of extension by the end of 1976. About two-thirds of these works are musical compositions, and in the bulk of these cases the families of composer-authors or their heirs, as well as a few authors and assignees, will benefit personally from royalty payments flowing from these works.

In short, the committee believes that the status and prospects of the general revision bill do provide the justification for another interim extension.

As chairman of the subcommittee that recommended that S. 3976 be favorably reported to the House, I am conveying the views of the Judiciary Committee as I understand them. For myself, however, I cannot concur in the action of my colleagues in ordering a further extension of expiring renewal terms of copyright. I continue to be of the opinion that in too many instances the measure will operate to provide an unjustifiable windfall at the expense of the public domain (see dissenting views in House Report Nos. 92-605 and 92-1449).

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON NEW TECHNOLOGICAL USES OF COPYRIGHTED WORKS

Title II of S. 3976 would create a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works in the Library of Congress. The Commission would study and compile data on the use of copyrighted works "in conjunction with automatic systems capable of storing, processing, retrieving, and transferring information, and—by various forms of machine reproduction, not including reproduction by or at the request of instructors for use in face-to-face teaching activities."

Twelve members of the Commission would be appointed by the President with four each from among three groups:

- First, authors and copyright owners;
- Second, copyright users; and
- Third, the general public.

The committee amendment No. 3 requires that at least one of the four public members shall be selected from among experts in consumer protection affairs. The Librarian of Congress would serve as the 13th voting member, and the Register of Copyrights would serve ex officio as a nonvoting member. The supporting staff, headed by an executive director, would be an administrative part of the Library of Congress.

Within 3 years after enactment of the bill, a final Commission report would be made, including recommendations for changes in the copyright law for the twin purposes of assuring access to copyrighted works while providing appropriate recognition of proprietary interests. An interim report would be due within 1 year after the first Commission meeting.

The inadequacy of the present law to deal with the range of problems arising from the use of copyrighted works in computer systems is well recognized. Moreover, even though section 108 of the revision bill deals with certain aspects of library photocopying, and other aspects of the problem are now before the Supreme Court in the Williams and Wilkins case, neither enactment of the revision bill nor a definitive decision in the lawsuit can be expected to solve the copyright problems presented by library photocopying or reprography generally. Both of these important public issues urgently need to be studied in depth by recognized experts, and to be reviewed by a commission or other organized body representing all of the interests affected. It is for this reason the committee is advised that the Copyright Office has supported creation of a National Commission either as part of the general revision bill or, if necessary, as separate legislation.

The committee agrees that it is not necessary to await enactment of the general revision package before undertaking the studies and consultations contemplated in title II of S. 3976. We share the hope of the Register of Copyrights that the studies and consultations needed to provide solutions to the copyright problems presented by reprography and the storage and transfer of information will be undertaken without further delay, and that they may be considered independent of the general revision bill itself.

COST OF COMMISSION

The Librarian of Congress has given the committee the following schedule of estimated expenses of the Commission:

	1st year	2d year	3d year
Salaries.....	$476,800	$692,800	$929,800
Other expenses.....	108,000	111,500	142,500
Total.....	584,800	804,300	1,072,300
Total 3-year cost.....	2,461,400

Although the committee recognizes that cost estimates of this character must often be rough, and although it tentatively accepts and adopts these estimates, the committee serves notice that it intends to exercise its oversight function and to keep itself informed with respect to these substantial expenditures. Expenditures of the magnitude of those here involved cannot be allowed to occur without close legislative scrutiny.

More significantly and specifically, however, the committee, by its amendment No. 4, has amended section 205 of this bill to limit the authorization to appropriate funds. As so amended, the authorization applies only to funds for the period preceding June 30, 1976.

Mr. MCCLORY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MCCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to say on my own behalf and on behalf of the members of the subcommittee and of the full committee that I fully agree with the comments made by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

There is concern about copyrights' expiring, and removal of the expiration date with respect to sound recordings and with respect to piracy and the creation of a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works would seem to be very much in order and would help the Congress to act intelligently and constructively on this at a future time.

Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be an overwhelming vote in support of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 3976. In 1962 the House began drafting a general revision of our copyright law.

December 19, 1974

An uncontroversial part of that revision is a provision that would extend the life of a copyright from its present term of 56 years (28+28) to 75 years. Believing that such a change was just 1 or 2 years down the legislative road in the early 1960's, the Congress chose to extend the life of existing copyrights since the new revision contemplated a 19-year longer term for such copyrights. In other words, every year copyrights expire and the Congress thought on eight prior occasions that it would be unfair to those copyrights that would expire just prior to the enactment of the new revision because their rights would be lost and placed in the public domain, whereas those copyrights that expired after the enactment of the new law would have received an expanded life of 19 years (75-56). The only equitable solution to this dilemma in light of the anticipated new revision was to keep the expiring copyrights alive until the Congress completed its work on the new revision law.

After several years of working on the general revision the House passed in 1967 a comprehensive copyright revision bill and in the interim the Congress kept expiring copyrights alive. Meanwhile in the other body the House-passed General Revision bill got bogged down in controversy and in the interim while the House waited for the other body to act, expiring copyrights were kept alive. After 7 years of waiting, last September by a vote of 70 to 1, the other body passed the General Copyright Revision bill, S. 1361. Given this action by both Houses, the likelihood of a general revision law next year is excellent. However, in the meanwhile, we have a total of 150,000 valuable copyright properties that will expire at the end of this month unless this 2-year extension is granted. About 100,000 of those 150,000 copyrights are of musical compositions and in the vast majority of these cases, the composer, author or their heirs are benefiting personally from royalty payments flowing from these copyrights.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to point out that in no case would any of these copyrights be given protection longer than the 75-year term which is contained in the revision bill. In other words, if this bill is adopted, those copyrights that would have expired in 1962 but for the extensions, will have used up 14 of their 19 years and when the new revision bill is enacted, hopefully in the next Congress, they will have 5 years remaining for a total of 75 years.

Mr. Speaker, it would make no sense to me for the Congress to have kept expiring copyrights alive all these years because of an anticipated enactment of a new law and just when it looks as if the Congress is going to enact that new law, it lets existing copyrights die. Given this situation, I believe we can live with just one more extension. I urge the Members to support this legislation.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from Illinois with respect to the creation of a commission.

The committee and, indeed, the Senate are sensitive to the fact that the Congress has been reluctant to create a commission, but we have really no alternative. Unless we are prepared to defer for years to come the treatment of technological uses of copyright, we can literally handle it in no other way.

The committee does recommend the creation of this commission.

Yesterday morning, the second page of the Washington newspaper contained a major discussion of a bill before the Supreme Court in which certain technological uses of copyright are referred to, but we cannot expect the court to determine in each instance how storage and retrieval systems and how various computer systems shall function under existing law, and consequently, we will have to, in our codification of copyright, eventually come to the point where we specifically write into the law the recommendations of this commission which the Senate thinks—and we join the Senate in this—should be created.

We did add an amendment, the Danielson amendment, which would require this commission to report back to the House of Representatives on an interim basis, in 18 months.

Mr. Speaker, on balance, I would say that it is necessary for the House to pass this legislation at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON).

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I, too, urge the support of this bill, which I feel we must pass at this time.

As my chairman has pointed out, the bill contains three operative provisions. The first is really to ratify a bill we passed earlier this year establishing penalties for the piracy of copyrighted works, principally phonograph records and tapes.

The second, being a critical one as far as time is concerned, is to extend until December 31, 1976, those copyrights which would otherwise expire on December 31, 1974. The reason this is necessary is that a comprehensive revision of the copyright laws will soon be underway. The other house sent a bill to us in September, but it is too complex a subject to be completed this year, although we do propose to go into it early next year. But this bill is to prevent these valuable copyrights from expiring at this time, so it is essential that we do pass this bill.

The last item, the commission, is inherently valuable in our forthcoming review of the copyright laws. With the advent of computer technology, recall electronics, data storage and the like, it is impossible for our courts to handle cases of copyright infringement under the existing law, which is the 1909 copyright law. The existing copyright law was passed and on the books long before anyone dreamed of the radio, let alone computer technology and the like. I therefore strongly urge that we pass this bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I do have a request from my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) and I yield 5 minutes at this time to that gentleman.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 3976. This bill has three main provisions.

The first main provision containing sections 101, 102, and 103, would remove the expiration date—January 1, 1975—and grant regular term copyright protection of records and tapes and increase the criminal penalties for piracy and counterfeiting of sound recordings as amended by the Judiciary Committee. This part of the bill is identical to legislation passed earlier this year by the House (H.R. 13364, October 7, 1974). This legislation has the support of the Register of Copyrights, Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce.

The second main provision contained in section 104 of the bill would extend until December 31, 1976, the copyright in works now due to expire on December 31, 1974. If this extension is enacted, it would be the ninth in a series of interim extensions of the renewal term of expiring copyrights which began in 1962. The principal justifications for these extensions for the bill is the general revision of the copyright law, S. 1361, which passed the Senate and is pending before the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice. The general revision legislation would add 19 years to the renewal term of all existing copyrights making a total of 75 years. Given the likelihood of favorable action on this general revision legislation early next year, it is only equitable to extend existing copyrights.

The third main provision of S. 3976 is contained in title 2 of the bill and it would create a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works. The Commission would study and compile data on the computer uses of copyrighted materials as well as the various forms of machine reproduction of copyrighted works. The Commission would complete its work within 3 years. This National Commission idea first passed the other body in the 90th Congress. This year it passed the other body twice, first as part of the general copyright revision bill, S. 1361, and then as title 2 of this bill presently before us today, S. 3976.

The creation of a Commission is always closely scrutinized by the House and many times the creation of a Commission meets with the disfavor of this body, and rightly so. But there is a critical need for the very specialized information which this Commission is expected to provide. The Judiciary Committee neither possesses the expertise nor will it have time to develop such a study. One of the legislative matters the committee will be working on early next year will be a general revision of the entire copyright law which has remained pretty much intact since 1909. The creation of this Commission is presently a part of the general revision bill (S. 1361). It will be useful to establish a Commission at this time in order to help us prepare for and facilitate the resolution of these highly technical copyright issues.

At first the Copyright Office projected

a total 3-year cost of the Commission at almost $2.5 million. The Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice was unanimous in believing that this estimate was excessive and should be cut back. After the report was filed, I was advised by the Register of Copyrights that, given the disposition of the subcommittee, the cost of the Commission can and shall be revised downward by at least one-half and may be more. This can be done, as I understand, by using the personnel and office space of the Library of Congress and the office and personnel of the Register of Copyrights. I believe these two offices should work closely together and develop the needed technical information and keep the cost down to a bare minimum.

To assist in keeping the cost down, the committee adopted an amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANIELSON) which would limit the money authorization for the Commission to June 30, 1976, which would be for 1½ years, which is exactly one-half of the Commission's total life of 3 years. This will have the effect of forcing the Commission back to the Congress after half of its life is completed, giving the Congress the opportunity to review the Commission's work product to date, its direction and use of its money. Given the critical need for this particular study the assurances of the Register of Copyrights and this built-in authorization safeguard, I urge my colleagues to support the enactment of S. 3976.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt but what this piece of legislation will pass, but I think the Members of the House ought to know that it is an incredibly bad piece of legislation.

Before I proceed to denounce the legislation for what it is, I would like to compliment my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER), who has been very fair in giving me notice so that I might get up this year, as I do every year, to point out the outrage that this piece of legislation is.

I want it understood that my remarks, in no fashion, should be interpreted by my colleagues as in any fashion indicating anything other than the highest regard, deservedly and properly so, that I have for my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

What does this bill do? First of all, it is a Christmas tree. This bill comes up, by the way, at the end of every session as it does every Congress. It is the ninth time since 1962 that the Congress has had this kind of an extension bill before us.

And what is the real thrust of the bill? The real thrust of the bill is to extend copyrights—to extend copyrights. And whom does it extend them for? For the authors, for their heirs, for a bunch of poor old ladies who hold copyrights? By no means—not for old ladies, not for heirs, not for anybody other than the big publishing houses who are going to have their copyrights extended for the ninth time.

I have asked for copies of the hearings—where the hearings were had, and I must confess I have received two documents which I am informed cover the question of whether or not copyrights should be extended. But a quick reading—and that was all the time I had on these two documents—indicates that the question was never really placed before the American people or their representatives whether copyrights going back now 50 and 60 years should be extended for another year.

The beneficiaries are interesting: ASCAP—ASCAP—one of the curious institutions which hold copyrights, and which holds them not for the benefit really of the authors, but which holds them for the benefit of its own interests. And Broadcast Music—and they, also. Each of these institutions would merit a very careful consideration from the standpoint of the antitrust laws as to their actions, activities, and as to whether in fact they serve the public interest, which, in my view at least, is highly doubtful.

In other years we had the gentleman from New York, Manny Celler, the beloved late chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who would rise and assure the House that this is the last time we are ever going to have this question before us, because we are going to have a general revision of the copyright law, next Congress.

He began those promises of revisions in 1962, and periodically I would inquire as to when he was going to deliver on that promise. In one instance, he finally in his last year here decided that he was going to renege on the promise altogether, that his commitments which I quoted to him in the record were simply not going to be honored.

I recognize the fact that this is brought up during the closing days of the session. It is much easier to handle a piece of legislation that has as little merit as this during the closing days than to face the searching scrutiny of a proper hearing and proper consideration by Members of this body with regard to the merits of the legislation.

Let us have a clear understanding of the function of the copyright laws. The copyright laws were to protect the works of authors which had originality and which had merit, and to give them a period during which they would not move into the public domain, during which time the author would be assured that he would be the sole beneficiary of his labors. That situation has largely been corrupted by a number of circumstances.

First of all, the original copyright, once extended under the law, has been statutorily extended to the detriment of the public at large on no less than nine occasions, and so almost all the original authors and holders of these copyright laws have now passed from the realm of the living. Very few of those many thousands who are cited in the report are still around to derive the benefits of their copyrights and benefits of their labors.

These copyrights have passed to the big publishing houses. They have passed to the recording companies. They have passed to other persons who have them as speculators, and to others who otherwise bought the interests in these copyrights.

The argument is made that this section is going to cost the taxpayers nothing. It is not going to cost them anything as taxpayers, but as readers, as consumers, and as citizens it is going to cost them plenty, because they are going to keep on paying for the ninth extension of the copyright laws for the benefit not of the public at large, for the benefit not of the public domain, but for the benefit of the publishing houses and ASCAP and speculators, investors, and persons like that.

That is who the beneficiaries of this legislation are. They are not the widows and they are not the children and they are not the heirs and they are not the authors, but they are often a bunch of possible antitrust violators who stand to get by fiat of the Congress of the United States another extension of the copyright laws for their particular benefit. That is what is at stake.

There are other things in this legislation that Congress ought to be aware of. The Judiciary Committee has been studying these copyright laws at least since I came to the Congress in 1955. They always promise a general revision of the copyright law especially in connection with these extensions. They now set themselves up a commission in this bill to study copyright revisions. We are literally awash in commissions in this town, and these commissions cost a great deal of money.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, and I am a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have been guilty since 1962 of studying time and again the extension of this copyright bill, and at the last meeting of the Judiciary Committee I told them I had crossed that wire for the last time. They have told us and told us in this Congress and in that committee that we are just going to extend it one more time, and I believe we have extended it long enough. I want to say since 1962 we have been extending it. I believe 12 years is long enough to give these people the benefit and the advantage of extending their original contract.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, my sentiments are very similar to those of the gentleman from Texas.

The Judiciary Committee under its new chairman in this Congress has been preoccupied for over a year with extraordinary burdens, including two Vice Presidential nominations and the Presidential impeachment proceedings. Had we not had these burdens we might have moved a great deal of other business out of the committee before the end of this Congress. Hopefully, the committee will not have to repeat those assignments in the next Congress. Surely, before the end of the next Congress we should have come up with some permanent legislation to take care of this once and for all, and should cease granting these 1-year extensions.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. KAZEN).

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman, how old are some of the copyrights which are being prolonged and extended by this bill?

Mr. DINGELL. Let me ask my friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin, that question: How old are some of the oldest copyrights involved in this?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, they are from 1906 and date from the period 1906 to 1918. Normally those obtained in 1906 would expire 56 years thereafter, in 1962. In 1962 the Congress decided to extend these copyrights and they will have been extended nine times since then. So those particular copyrights are extended. However, in no event could they be extended beyond 75 years. I think the Members are entitled to know that it was contemplated that originally a new term would be contemplated of life plus 50 but all existing copyrights would be extended to a total of 75 years, and it was in that context that these early existing extensions of subsisting copyrights was passed by the Congress.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank my colleague. So they go from 56 years plus 9 years plus 1 year, that is 66 years, and then when the general copyright extension comes forward they will extend it to 75 years, and through this pattern; if we are here at the end of that time, we will have an American copyright extension bill before us, just as this one is.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman in the well and I am of the opinion that these copyrights have been protected long enough.

Mr. DINGELL. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his effort, but I would like to point out that our former colleague, Chairman Celler, did remind us: Promises are like pie crusts: They are easily broken.

Mr. DINGELL. I can only assume that was a campaign promise. The hard fact is that they are going to set up in addition to that a commission.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, they are going to figure out how to extort further from the reading public, the listening public, and the consuming public.

We ought to take a look at the four members from the authors and copyright owners, four from the copyright users, and four from the general public; that means the publishers, not the citizens of art; four nongovernmental members selected from the public generally.

Then there is the Library of Congress. Now, the Library of Congress is a longtime supporter of long-term extensions of copyrights. Every time we get one of these abominations before the House, we find one of the principal pushers and promoters is the Library of Congress.

Then there are the folks in the Copyright Office. They are here taking care of ASCAP and BMI and the big publishing companies.

This is nothing more than a ripoff of the American consumer, the American reading public, and the American listening public. I say "Shame." We ought not to have it here. We ought not to have it here at this time. It is going to extort more money from the people. We are told it is not going to cost the Government anything, but the Commission will cost a pile of money, a couple million dollars. In addition to that, the reading public, the listening public, the consuming public, are going to be ripped off. This legislation ought to be summarily defeated.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I want to apologize for rising a little late to bring up this point. I notice the hour is 12:25. I wondered if we were heading in the direction of consideration of the private bill for the relief of one Nelson Rockefeller.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, that matter will be up shortly; but we are presently on the copyright bill.

Mr. Speaker, in that connection, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. FULTON).

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to express my strong support of this legislation and I commend the Committee on the Judiciary, especially on this particular section we are considering.

Before the 93d Congress adjourns, we must extend the limited copyright protection afforded to sound recordings against modern-day pirates of the legitimate work of musicians, artists, and record companies. Title I of S. 3976 does this. It continues to provide a tool for Federal law enforcement authorities to move against the thieves who steal the creative efforts of composers, arrangers, singers, musicians, and the countless others who bring us the wide world of recorded music.

Pirates steal the successful works of others. When a recording company produces a "hit," the pirates move in and reproduce it on tape. These leeches on legitimate business and labor pay no musicians, no artists, little or no advertising and promotion and seldom, if ever, pay copyright fees to composers and publishers. Yet, they skim the cream off the industry.

Pirates sell cheap reproductions of the recordings which have taken many hours and many hundreds of dollars to produce. Because no fees are paid, they sell their imitations at lower cost. But stolen merchandise often is cheaper.

Legitimate companies pay for what they use and pay for what they produce. They contribute to pension and welfare funds. They pay scores of experts. They spend money to create and to promote. They bear the losses of recordings that do not become hits.

Without the protection of Federal antipiracy legislation, the pirates will increase their activities. This would be intolerable since last year, despite Federal legislation and similar laws in many States, record pirates are estimated to have earned $200 million with their stolen merchandise.

We need more protection against pirates, not less. We need less piracy, not more. The pending legislation increases penalties against those convicted of piracy.

While I represent one of the music centers of America and scores of people in my district have a direct stake in protecting legitimate recordings, this is not a parochial problem. It is necessary that we extend the Federal antipiracy law so that it does not die on December 31, and increase the penalties against the pirates.

I commend the distinguished chairman of the Copyright Subcommittee (Mr. KASTENMEIER) and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee (Mr. RODINO) for their efforts in this regard.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SMITH), a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I might say to the gentleman from Michigan, that there was testimony before our committee that in addition to ASCAP and the Broadcast Music Institute and some of the big people in the publishing field also, there are a great deal of royalties which go from their ownership of copyrights to the original authors and families of authors.

I had a letter myself from one of these authors who hoped that we would continue with the extension of the copyright.

Now, the only justification for this further extension, after eight different extensions, is the fact that from year to year there has been the good possibility, or a possibility, that the copyright law would undergo in this Congress a general revision, and if we will remember, this House has voice-passed a revision of the copyright bill. The other body had not moved on it until this last September, at which time, I think it was September 9, the other body did pass a general revision of the copyright law.

I understand it is the intention of the chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) to move forward on the House side in the new Congress as soon as possible, because now that the other body has moved and there is a prospect of enacting a general revision of this law, it looks as if we may get this general revision; so it seems only logical and fair to extend those copyrights that would otherwise expire during the interim period between December 31 of this year and the time when a general revision of the copyright law is adopted.

The fact is that the general revision will create a term of some 75 years of copyrights as opposed to our present term of 56 years—two terms of 28. In addition to that, I might say, if the Members will remember, those who were here when the House passed a general revision bill, the rest of the world has copyrights that extend for lifetime of the author plus 50 years in many instances.

We here in the United States have copyright protection extending for the shortest period. I am sure the effort will be made in the new copyright revision, as it was in the two bills the House did pass, to bring the United States more in harmony with the rest of the world.

I would like to make one remark, if I may, about the commission. I think some sort of institution, commission, committee, advisory board, is necessary to go into these questions of automatic data processing and reproduction that are now facing us and recommend a legal resolution to these tough questions.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope S. 3976 will be passed overwhelmingly by this House.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DRINAN).

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, I commend the members of the subcommittee of which I am a member. I also commend the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. KASTENMEIER, for working out the best arrangement that is possible under all the present circumstances. I have difficulties with this bill, as the chairman does.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, let me say briefly in conclusion that while I sympathize with the importance of what the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) has had to say about the extension of existing copyrights, nonetheless the Congress has spoken, and spoken often, on the subject. It has in the past consistently extended these copyrights, and the fact of the matter is that next year is a year when we should have general revision.

I think the proponents can and have made that point. Next year, when we come back for general revision, that Congress will have an opportunity to determine whether it wants to extend subsisting copyrights for 75 years, as it proposed in the legislation, and whether it wants a term of life plus 50. Thus far, there is every indication that it will do as they did in the House and as they did in the Senate in 1964.

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to know how to vote on a bill which contains both the good and the bad. S. 3976 is a measure of that kind. It has three discrete parts: First, a provision to extend existing copyrights; second, a provision to perpetuate copyright protection for sound recordings, first enacted in 1971, and third, a provision to establish a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works. I support the first part, but not the second and third sections.

The decision whether to vote for or against in this case is further complicated by the status of the beneficiaries of part of the bill. In the past several weeks, I have received a number of letters from the survivors, heirs, and descendants of many famous American writers and composers. They seek an extension of existing copyrights on the ground that part, and in some instances, most of their present income derives from royalties which are still being paid on the works of the deceased artist. To be sure, the case they present is compelling.

But their just claim for continued protection cannot be evaluated in a vacuum. Other interests are at stake. A great number of these existing copyrights are in fact held by large corporations whose business practices, in the view of some, are not consistent with the antitrust laws. For example, just a few weeks ago the Justice Department filed a civil complaint against a large number of the major book publishers alleging monopolistic practices. These charges, if proved, would indicate the shoddy and unfair manner in which these companies have treated the American consumer and the rest of the industry. Extending copyrights which may inure largely to the benefit of these corporations and at the expense of the consumer is something which should give each of us pause.

Furthermore, S. 3976 would extend without limitation the copyright protection we first gave to sound recordings in 1971. On October 10, 1974, this House passed H.R. 13364, a bill nearly identical to the sound-recording copyright provisions of S. 3976. I voted against that bill in subcommittee, in full committee, and on the floor, principally for three reasons: First, we did not adequately examine the impact of the law on the competitive aspects of the recording industry, on consumer prices, and on artistic freedom; second, the criminal penalties in H.R. 13364 were too severe, and third, the act did not contain an expiration date as did the original law.

Since that occasion, I have seen no evidence which would persuade me to alter my position on the matter. In addition, this bill would establish a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works. With 13 members appointed by the President, this agency would examine the innovative aspects of copyrights and report its findings and recommendations to the Congress and the President. The estimated cost for three years is $2,461,400. In my judgment the cost of the Commission is excessive. At a time when there is great concern over the size of the Federal budget, I cannot justify the nearly $2.5 million which this bill authorizes for this new agency. I think we could save the taxpayers a great deal of money if we merely authorized funds to support independent research on the subject. That would surely accomplish our aim, and reap the additional advantage of securing truly independent and disinterested judgments about the applicability of copyrights in these new and emerging areas.

I also object to the provision which gives the President the sole power of appointment. The bill does not even contain the usual requirement that the Senate give its advice and consent to the nominees for the Commission. When it is considered that the Commission staff will be an administrative part of the Library of Congress, the requirement of presidential exclusivity is more astounding.

Furthermore at least eight of its members must be chosen from among those who have a vested interest in preserving and extending copyrights. What is needed at the present time is not perpetuation of entrenched economic power. What is needed is independent and dispassionate judgment of the utility of the assumed benefits of copyright protection. The appointment mechanism of this bill is hardly calculated to achieve that result.

One, of course, cannot be blind to the interests of the descendants of composers and writers. Nor on the other hand can one be insensitive to the grave concerns of the American consumer and taxpayer. For these reasons, I vote, though reluctantly, against this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 3976), as amended.

The question was taken and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the grounds that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair makes a determination, the Chair is going to state that we are going immediately into the Vice Presidential confirmation proceedings after this vote.

Evidently a quorum is not present. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 292, nays 101, not voting 41, as follows:

CONFIRMING NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER AS VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1519 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

H. RES. 1519

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move, clause 28(d) (4) of rule XI to the contrary notwithstanding, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 1511) confirming Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President of the United States. After general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed six hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and Representative Robert W. Kastenmeier, of Wisconsin, the Committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to final adoption or rejection.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Michigan (Mrs. GRIFFITHS) for the purpose of making a unanimous-consent request.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Michigan?

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and I shall not object, but I do so in order to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The question is: I asked for time to speak on the rule, and I was told that because I was in opposition to it I could not speak; that the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) was anxious to get the matter over with. I ask the gentleman from New York: Will I be granted permission to speak on the rule?

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from California said is true. The gentleman asked for time. I told the gentleman I was in favor of the adoption of the rule, and that from what the gentleman indicates in the Committee on Rules he was in opposition to it, and I told the gentleman I had no intention of delaying it any further.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. MARTIN).

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, I have reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has reserved the right to object.

The regular order has been demanded. The regular order is: Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Michigan?

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a quorum has just been established. The Chair will count.

Two hundred thirty-five Members are present. A quorum is present.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. MARTIN) pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1519 provides that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Resolution 1511 confirming Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President of the United States.

House Resolution 1519 provides for a waiver of clause 28(D)(4) of rule XI of the Rules of the House—the 3-day rule.

House Resolution 1519 provides for 6 hours of general debate—2 hours to be controlled by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, 2 hours to be controlled by the ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee and 2 hours to be controlled by Representative ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER of Wisconsin. After general debate is concluded, the committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to final adoption or rejection.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Michigan (Mrs. GRIFFITHS) for the purpose of making a unanimous-consent request.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Michigan?

December 19, 1974

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of House Resolution 1519 in order that we may discuss, debate and pass House Resolution 1511.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New York has explained, House Resolution 1519 provides for 6 hours of debate on House Resolution 1511 providing for the confirmation of Nelson A. Rockefeller as the Vice President of the United States. The 6 hours are to be divided equally between the chairman and the ranking member of the committee and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) representing those in opposition to the resolution.

I am not going to speak very long, nor am I going to cover the subjects included in the committee report. I should like to call attention to the House, however, that the request from President Ford for the nomination of Nelson Rockefeller as Vice President was made 5 months ago tomorrow. I compliment the House Committee on the Judiciary and its chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) for the excellent, exhaustive, and detailed study which they have made of Mr. Rockefeller and his activities throughout his entire life.

Immediately upon receipt of this message, the chairman of the committee appointed and set up an able, adequate staff to go into every phase of Mr. Rockefeller's life. In addition to this, 31 agencies in the Federal Government were requested to make a complete report of all activities of Mr. Rockefeller in any context that he or his family had had with those particular agencies, and of all correspondence Mr. Rockefeller or his family had had with those agencies.

Over 400 FBI agents were put on the job of investigating very thoroughly from the day that Nelson Rockefeller was born up to the present in every area of the United States in which he had appeared, and other parts of the world as well.

I just wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many Members of the Congress could come up with a clean bill of health from such an exhaustive investigation as Mr. Rockefeller has gone through.

I want to speak about some of the things that I learned about Nelson Rockefeller beginning back in 1926. I first met Nelson Rockefeller at Dartmouth College up at Hanover, N.H. I was a sophomore, and he was a freshman. I did not know him well on campus, but I do know some things about him that happened during our college years together.

First of all, he was just a plain, ordinary student at the college, just as plain as an old shoe. In regard to his allowance, his allowance was probably less than the average student at Dartmouth received at that time. It was far less than many students received.

Because of Nelson Rockefeller's upbringing in a good Christian home, and the fundamental teachings that he received from both his mother and his father, he learned from a very early age as a young boy that 10 percent of his allowance was to be contributed to the church or to charitable institutions.

When Nelson Rockefeller was at Dartmouth, from the very modest allowance which he received from his parents he contributed 10 percent to the church in Hanover, N.H., and in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, he attended church services regularly every Sunday, and in addition to that he taught a Sunday school class. How many college students engage in that sort of activity?

Another thing that Nelson Rockefeller learned from his boyhood, from his mother and from his father, was that he was going to have a great responsibility, in his manhood, to society and to his fellow citizens because of the tremendous wealth of the Rockefeller family. It was impressed on young Nelson Rockefeller that he should use this power and this money wisely and for the benefit of mankind, and all the Rockefeller children have done that. They have done an outstanding job in handling the tremendous wealth which that family has and in contributing millions and millions of dollars to be helpful not only to fellow citizens in the United States but also in many, many other countries of the world.

There are some cynics in the country today who do not understand this basic philosophy of Nelson Rockefeller and his family. They put some sinister connotations on the fact that the Rockefellers have contributed funds and made loans to their friends and to institutions in order to be helpful. This is part of his way and it was the way he was brought up and it is the only way he understands how to utilize the wealth that family has accumulated: for the benefit of mankind.

Then a few words regarding his public life: He has been elected four times as Governor of the great State of New York, representing about 18 million people. He has had vast administrative experience as the chief executive officer in New York State.

In the field of the Federal Government, five Presidents of the United States of both parties have appointed Nelson Rockefeller to responsible jobs in our Federal Government in both the domestic and foreign fields. In every one of these jobs Mr. Rockefeller has done an outstanding job and has been commended for the work that he did in the particular duties and jobs to which he was assigned by these five Presidents of the United States.

So he has had experience not only in the domestic field but also in the foreign field.

As a result of his background and experience Nelson Rockefeller is well qualified to be the next Vice President of the United States.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from the last two very brief paragraphs of the majority report on this resolution:

Looking at the total record, however, the Committee finds Nelson A. Rockefeller fit and qualified to be Vice President, and believes his nomination merits confirmation pursuant to the Twenty-fifth Amendment.

Nothing in the Committee's hearing record or in its investigative files was found to disqualify Mr. Rockefeller from service. On the contrary, the evidence warrants an endorsement of his capacity and fitness to serve as Vice President.

Mr. Speaker, I second those views. I support the rule and I support the nomination of Mr. Rockefeller as Vice President of the United States.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. I will yield very briefly. I will not yield for a speech by the gentleman.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I do not intend to make a speech.

The gentleman has mentioned that he felt that the Committee on the Judiciary had gone through Mr. Rockefeller's record very thoroughly.

If the gentleman will remember, yesterday in the Committee on Rules I raised the issue and question whether there had been a thorough and complete investigation of the potential impact of the Foundation activities in the political arena. Is the gentleman satisfied that the Committee on Judiciary gave adequate and thorough time on that point or should the rule provide more time for such subject matter?

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. I cease to yield to the gentleman any further. That will be covered very thoroughly by the Members of the Committee on the Judiciary in the general debate that will take place in a few minutes.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Assuming we get the time.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that I am being allotted 2 hours of time principally for those who are in opposition to this resolution. My question to the gentleman from Nebraska is whether there is anything in the rule which would prevent the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) or the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HUTCHINSON) from allowing time to those who oppose the confirmation of Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, that is correct and normally the chairman and the members of the committee are very fair in allowing time under the rule.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I just want briefly to call attention to a House resolution which I introduced a year ago, which would create a solution to the problem of how we handle Vice Presidential nominations under the 25th amendment. The confirmation resolution would be a matter of high privilege and come directly to the floor. I will not go into the details, of the procedures in my House resolution but I hope the Committee on Rules, having been confronted with this problem twice under the 25th amendment, will early next year deal with this procedural situation with regard to handling of Vice-Presidential nominations.

December 19, 1974

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I regret that the Committee on Rules chose not to honor the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary for 8 hours of debate on this very important matter. I should note, of course, that the Committee on Rules originally reported a rule providing for 4 hours of debate and subsequently reconsidered that matter and allotted 6 hours for debate purposes.

I very much regret that the Committee on Rules chose not to give 8 hours of debate time, because I think the issue before us today is enormously important. It is imperative that every Member of the House have an opportunity to hear the arguments both pro and con, not only with respect to Nelson Rockefeller as an individual, but also, and perhaps more importantly, with respect to some very fundamental questions raised by this nomination concerning the relationship between political power and private economic power in our society.

Now, I am not going to try to go into the substance of the matters that will be covered in the general debate after the adoption of the rule, but I urge the Members to take the report of the committee and to peruse it carefully and in particular to go through those arguments contained in the minority report and the additional, supplemental, and dissenting views contained in the report with respect to this nomination.

I also asked the Members to go to the printed hearings and look at those sections which attempt, incompletely I regret, to lay out the reach of the private economic power that is exercised by the Rockefeller family. I believe that issue, the merger of great, concentrated private economic power with the public power of the National Government of the United States, raises a very fundamental question which each Member of this House, before he votes today on the nominee, ought to consider as responsibly as possible.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. MEZVINSKY).

Mr. MEZVINSKY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, the reason I am speaking on this rule is to add to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland. When I appeared before the Rules Committee and support the chairman's request for 8 hours, I did so because we are dealing with a situation that is unique.

Under the 25th amendment, we cannot simply treat this nomination as a national convention-like confirmation, but rather we must really analyze and test the particular designee; in this case, Mr. Rockefeller.

I would submit that the issue of conflict of interest is sophisticated, one that has never come before this body in the form that the nomination of Mr. Rockefeller presents today.

It is terribly unique. It is one that calls for understanding. One must look at the report, understand the hearings, because, as was pointed out, we have cynicism which exists, we have suspicion that runs rampant. The 25th amendment and this designee fall into the category of whether or not this House can face an issue that is terribly unique.

The problem is one of conflict; the problem is one of economic influence in this country and its merger with political influence. The question is whether we as a body can face it, face it forthrightly and debate the issue so that history can see whether or not we recognize its significance and judge whether the 25th amendment is really operating as it was envisioned by those who drew it up several years ago.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT).

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague yielding to me.

The reason I appeared before the Rules Committee yesterday was for two reasons: Either to encourage an expansion to 8 hours of debate on the House floor, or, to have as an alternative the Judiciary Committee reexamine the issue of the impact of a vast number of foundations controlled by the Rockefeller interests in the field of political action. My understanding is that this subject was really not fully explored, and I felt it should be. I was led to believe the subject would be covered in the Judiciary Committee hearings or I would have testified myself.

Second, I was very disturbed when I picked up the Los Angeles Times yesterday—and I understand many papers across the country also used a photo of our chairman, Mr. RODINO, and Mr. Rockefeller toasting. In these many news stories and wire photos we were told that this confirmation here today was just pro forma—that everything was set; it was all done, and the "formality" of the vote would now almost automatically follow.

I was somewhat disturbed that we were not really being allowed the full 8-hour discussion of this important issue. Now, it is true that I am disinclined to vote for this nomination, but that was not the reason I was so concerned about this specific nomination coverage across the country. The subtle and not so subtle direction of this news coverage was that the nomination was "in the bag"—it was all wrapped up. There was going to be a big celebration in the Senate a few minutes after the confirmation. The television people would all be there in the Senate for the first time in the history of the Senate and the House would just kind of go through the motions today.

That presumption concerned me in a substantial way. I did not feel we were sent here by our constituents to be a rubberstamp. Even though the Committee on the Judiciary has spent hours upon hours and days upon days on this subject, it still requires our thought and proper time. I was concerned that suddenly there was a great effort to cut down the time on the floor and not give us the opportunity to make proper inquiry on some of these issues.

I am grateful to the Committee on Rules for increasing the time to 6 hours. I think that was correct. But I still believe that with a subject of the magnitude of this nomination especially when the electorate as a whole has not had an opportunity to vote on candidacy, we should have an opportunity to express the concepts and questions of our own countryman on the issues that need to be raised. I thought it should be extended to 8 hours or the Committee on the Judiciary should return to its hearing room and consider the ramifications of the Rockefeller foundations that they have not had a chance to study.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I share the thoughts the gentleman has so well expressed, but I want to say that I think the publication of the picture of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary was very unfair and gave a completely false impression. The press has taken it and tried to make of it something that it actually was not.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Yes. Especially when Mr. RODINO informed us that that picture was taken a week before yesterday's news story it really did not relate to the moment; and I think it was rather unfortunate that it was played across the country the way it was and that we were just a kind of rubberstamp operation here in the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman I would like to point out that when we had the nomination of Mr. Gerald R. Ford for Vice President about a year or so ago, that there was 6 hours granted under the rule, and the House used slightly over 5 hours.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the chairman such time as he may consume, since his name has been brought up.

Mr. RODINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the subject that the gentleman from California brought up a while ago, and that is the use of a picture which depicted me and another member of the Committee on the Judiciary toasting Mr. Rockefeller, the Vice President-designate.

It is unfortunate that this picture was used, and used at a time prior to the debate on this very momentous question. That picture was taken more than a week ago, at the conclusion of the hearings, and at a time when this Member had surely not made up his mind as to how he would vote on the confirmation, or on the resolution which was before the committee.

December 19, 1974

This Member has sought to protect the rights of those who have been in opposition at all times. As a matter of fact, I regret very much that that picture, which was taken in a very private little gathering to which I had been invited and to which I went out of courtesy because I had been invited by the minority staff, portends to show anything other than a simple courtesy on my part to be with the Members of the minority because they had asked after we had concluded with the hearings. It is nothing more. To read anything in that, anything beyond that, is absolutely unfair and dishonest.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. McCLODY).

Mr. McCLODY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to speak in support of the rule and also say that I share the regret of the chairman that his picture was used, and I think it gave the wrong impression. I am happy the gentleman gave an explanation, and I want to concur in the explanation he made.

I would also like to say that the Committee on Rules has been very fair in granting the 6-hour rule. As a matter of fact, although my colleagues on the other side of the aisle requested an 1-hour rule, they are getting the 4 hours which they requested for themselves, because the rule provides 2 hours to the chairman of the committee and 2 hours to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER). So there are 4 hours provided to my colleagues on that side of the aisle. It seems to me that it is eminently fair that distribution of time has been made as it has been made.

I think we should recall that this investigation by the House Committee on the Judiciary has been going on for 4 months and that we have carried on a thorough and complete investigation. We have had access to FBI reports. We have examined a vast amount of material which is contained in a large volume which is available to the Members.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to commend the chairman of the committee and my colleague, the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HURCHINSON) for the kind of thoroughgoing investigation which has been carried on to illuminate and inform the Members so they can vote intelligently on this subject today. It seems to me that we have a very complete record available to us.

I want to support the appraisal of the nominee that has been made by my colleague, the ranking member of the Committee on Rules, and I wish to state that I am hopeful that we can get on to the general debate on this subject, and that we may vote to confirm the nominee.

I might say that the plans for the swearing-in are not unlike the plans which were made with respect to the other Vice Presidential nominee, Gerald R. Ford, when he was confirmed as Vice President. It seems to me the leadership is the one that has made these plans; it is not the members of the committee who have made the plans as to what is going to follow the vote here today.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. WALDIE).

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Speaker and not the unyielding gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) for the 5 minutes that were just yielded to me. I want also to suggest that it is precisely that type of attitude on the part of the gentleman from New York, in denying an opportunity to fully debate and to fully examine the facts of this nomination, that causes the nomination to be viewed with suspicion by many.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALDIE. No, I will not yield. Mr. Speaker, I ask for regular order. I am not going to yield to the gentleman. I suggest the gentleman can do as he required of me—make a point of order of no quorum if he wants some time.

Mr. Speaker, I am taking this 5 minutes because there is not sufficient time during general debate, although I am with those Members who appreciate that we have extended the time for debate from 4 hours to 6 hours.

Even so, there are those members on this committee who are asking for additional time, and they are entitled to it. So the best way we can get time is to use part of this hour on the rule to speak to the issues that we will not be able to address in general debate.

One of the problems with the debate and with this issue is this: We have had given to us as of last night a volume consisting of almost 1,400 pages of hearings of the Committee on the Judiciary. I am fairly familiar with these pages, as are most of the members of the committee, but I dare say that hardly any other Members of the House are familiar with the hearings which the Committee on the Judiciary held. Although I found some objection in terms of the scope of those hearings, they still are quite instructive as to the particular holdings of the nominee and as to the potential use by the nominee of his private wealth contrary to public interest, as well as the actual use of that private wealth.

Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to examine Mr. Rockefeller in terms of his concepts of wealth and my concept of wealth. For example, when one questions him about the use of $22 million of his family's money to purchase the office of Governor—and I use that term advisedly—there is not a soul in the world, I am sure, who believes Nelson Rockefeller could have been elected without his family coming up with $20 million-plus. The nominee does not perceive $20 million as being a great sum of money.

Now, that really is not good for the system. It has little to do with whether wealthy people should be denied access to public office. The question is: Should access to public office be made equally accessible to poor people as well as wealthy people? With a Rockefeller in the picture, it is not equally accessible.

The nominee says that was an abuse in the past that no longer will occur because New York has passed laws preventing that and the Federal Government has passed laws preventing that.

I then asked the nominee: "Do you agree that was an abuse at the time it was being exercised by you?"

And the nominee said, "Well, it was legal."

I said, "That really was not the question. Was it ethical? Was it an ethical use of your private wealth?"

The nominee said that he equated that particular issue of morality with legality. And then the most incredulous testimony of all contained in this record came when I asked the nominee if his testimony before our committee was testimony of direct recollection or if his testimony was testimony of reconstruction.

He said it was all reconstruction. There was no direct recollection in his testimony.

I said, "This committee has just been through an episode of listening to one of the most famous voices in this land, the former President of the United States, on tape, advising his staff people how to testify before congressional committees under oath or before courts; and the way to testify, the former President of the United States, Mr. Nixon, said, was to say, 'You don't recall.'"

Reconstruct or reconstruction, no direct recollection. Those are precisely the words the nominee used before our committee.

I am suggesting to the House that if the Members have an opportunity to read this record, they will find and conclude as I have, and as did many of the 12 members constituting the majority of the Democrats on that committee, that the nominee, charitably, was less than candid before our committee.

It just simply is not correct, as the nominee says, that the loans he made were, in fact, loans. It was apparent, and the nominee admitted, that he made gifts to these individuals prior to their obtaining public employment and subsequent to their leaving public employment. But he made "loans" in the intervening intervals between obtaining public employment and ending public employment. Moneys given by the nominee to these officials were denominated as loans, loans not containing any interest or bearing any collateral, and loans inevitably forgiven when the nominee left public office so that they could be converted into a gift without violating a statute of New York.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, I request the attention of the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY), a member of the Committee on Rules.

The division of time under this rule is fairly unique, 2 hours being granted the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, 2 hours to the ranking minority member of that committee, and 2 hours to a member of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

December 19, 1974

Will you explain to me why the Committee on Rules granted 2 hours to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER)?

Mr. DELANEY. I believe it was because, first of all, the time is usually divided between the majority and minority, which was done. Then the opposition claimed time. In an effort to be fair and because of the fact that there were as many votes against as there were for, they decided to assure the opposition an equal amount of time.

There is no limitation, either on the majority chairman or the minority or the ranking member, in granting additional time as they see fit.

What we tried to do here was to limit the discussion to the rule itself and not to the merits.

Mr. WIGGINS. I understand. The gentleman has answered my question that the 2 hours for the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is for the benefit of those who oppose the nomination.

Is it the gentleman's purpose to yield a portion of his time to those Republicans on this side of the aisle whom may also oppose the nomination?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I gave assurance to the chairman and members of the Committee on Rules that I would be willing to yield not more than 30 minutes to opponents of the nomination from the minority. However, I ask that those members be designated and that I be given the names so that I might program their time.

In the interval, however, I understand that certain of such members have sought time from the ranking minority member, and perhaps there are some other accommodations.

I can assure the gentleman from California that I have reserved a limited amount of time for minority members.

Mr. WIGGINS. How much time is the gentleman now prepared to designate for minority members who oppose the nomination?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. As I told the gentleman from California (Mr. DEL CLAUSEN), even at this moment I would be willing to reserve up to 30 minutes, but would prefer it if the 30 minutes were specifically requested by Members of the minority in opposition, so that I would be able to program accordingly, because I have had requests for all the remaining hour and a half. Personally, at this time, I have reserved 10 minutes, specifically, for Members of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WIGGINS. I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield

5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN).

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. DELANEY) for yielding time to me. I do not intend to take the 5 minutes. I want to speak in opposition to this rule, not only because I oppose the confirmation of Mr. Rockefeller, but because I feel very strongly, despite the thorough investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary, that there are serious matters that we have not investigated. To vote, therefore, on his nomination at this time is really premature.

Let me explain the reasons that I say this.

In the first place, we know that this nominee, if he assumes the Vice Presidency, and becomes President, would be faced with very serious conflicts of interest. There is no question about that. How do we protect the public on this issue?

The nominee says he will set up a blind trust. That is a symbolic gesture; it affords no real protection. I submit the only way to protect the public is through full disclosure of the extent of the nominee's economic power. How far does the power reach? How does it function? Is the nominee, for example, able to control the voting power of the stocks—worth billions of dollars—administered by the trust department of the Chase Manhattan Bank? We don't know. Is the nominee able to control the voting or management of the assets of the various foundations he and other members of his family have set up? We don't know the answer to that either. We cannot tell you about the distribution of, and the full range through which the nominee exercises, economic power. Without knowing what the nominee's real economic interests are, the public has no way of assessing or evaluating the disinterestedness of his conduct. We have left the public unprotected.

This is not a frivolous point, because we are talking about enormous economic power affecting central political and governmental issues, questions of antitrust policy, energy policy, tax policy, and the like, which will be coming up for this nominee's decision if he becomes President of the United States.

So I think just on this issue of failing to obtain full financial disclosure and thereby failing to protect the public, the rule should be rejected.

I also think this rule is premature because we still do not know if the gifts and "loans" made by Mr. Rockefeller were legal. The Committee on the Judiciary, unfortunately, did not make an independent investigation into the legality of the gifts that the nominee made. Let me say to the Members that we received a letter from six law professors telling us that these gifts violated the criminal laws of the State of New York. Aside from that letter all the committee has are briefs by the nominee's lawyers, who obviously have a biased point of view. I think it would be absurd if, after this nominee were confirmed, we were to learn that he had, in fact, violated the laws of the State of New York. I am not suggesting that he has, but I am suggesting that the committee should have made that study before it asked Members of the House of Representatives to vote.

We also have not obtained from this nominee a complete list of the gifts that he made while he was Governor of the State of New York. We cannot assure the Members or the people of this country that there are no other gifts to public officials. Mr. Rockefeller refused to supply a complete list of gifts to nonrelatives. Furthermore, we cannot tell you whether Mr. Rockefeller's brothers made gifts to persons who held public offices while Mr. Rockefeller was Governor.

I think these are important questions to which we need to get the answers. For this reason, this rule comes prematurely.

In addition, I am deeply troubled that the nominee has failed to give us clear answers on essential matters of national policy. We cannot, therefore, tell our constituents that we voted in accordance with what we knew his positions to be.

For example, Mr. Rockefeller made no specific statements on anti-trust enforcement, foreign tax credits for multinational corporations, excess profits taxes and price rollbacks in the oil industry, and Federal tax reform. Because these matters will inevitably present conflicts of interest to a man of the nominee's great wealth, he should have been most careful to provide specifics in order to reassure the American people. He provided none.

The nominee dodged repeated questions on executive privilege, wiretapping, pardons for Watergate defendants and the use of the FBI to stifle dissent. He refused to promise not to lie to the public, and not to set up a "plumbers" operation, should he become President.

Mr. Rockefeller made no commitment about whether he would favor U.S. recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization, but instead made the profoundly disturbing observation that the Palestinians "were on their land, and they—the Israelis—took the land." He also refused to say whether he saw any danger in massive Arab investments in U.S. defense industries.

The nominee made no statement or the central issue of reordering Government priorities to deal with human needs. He would not indicate whether or where he felt the military budget could be cut. He would not even answer a direct question about whether he agreed with President Ford's proposed cuts in food stamps, Medicaid and Medicare assistance to the elderly.

I know the public wants answers to these questions, and is entitled to answers. I believe, therefore, that without the answers to these and other questions posed, this rule should be defeated.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

December 19, 1974

I want to comment on an observation made by the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules earlier in the debate when he pointed out that 6 hours was allowed for the debate on Gerald Ford. I want to ask him how in all good conscience his committee could have; as it originally did, made the decision to schedule only 4 hours of debate on Nelson Rockefeller, a far more controversial appointment than Gerald Ford, and an appointment which raises very fundamental issues not present in the previous Vice-Presidential confirmation.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SANDMAN).

Mr. SANDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question, since the time is so divided.

We have some people who are in opposition who have already taken 5 minutes. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will have 2 hours to divide among those same people, if he chooses. That will give him a second shot at it, and then the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) comes up as the anchor man, and he can give them as much time as he chooses. I wonder if there is any agreement for a little fairness here. Do they have to be first and last to the jury all the time, or are we going to do it the fair way? When does Mr. KASTENMEIER's time begin?

Mr. DELANEY. Is the gentleman asking me?

Mr. SANDMAN. I am asking the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DELANEY. I imagine they should rotate, and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary would end it.

Mr. SANDMAN. Does he have the right to give the same people the same time?

Mr. DELANEY. The Speaker will regulate that and recognize them. They try as nearly as possible to keep them on an even keel. That is a procedural question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am really kind of startled. Is this not a nonpartisan issue? Is this man not to be the Vice President of all of the people, and is it not a nonpartisan issue? I do not understand the minority saying "one side" or "the other side."

Mr. SANDMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I decline to yield further.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Ms. ABZUG).

Ms. ABZUG. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this rule. I appeared before the Committee on Rules in opposition to this rule as well.

I recognize the many pressures that have been generated to get the House to act on confirmation this week. If I do not place the concern for speedy action above all other considerations, it is because I am aware, as the Members are, that on 18 different occasions totaling almost 39 years, our Nation has been without a Vice President, and the Republic still stands.

Congress has provided for an orderly line of succession and if for any reason we should again be without a President before the present term is completed, remote as that coincidence may seem, it would be only a matter of minutes before a new acting President could be sworn into office.

I believe that the confirmation of a Vice President fits more properly into the responsibilities of the incoming Congress than into those of the present Congress, which includes many men and women who are retiring from office and which will be passing into history in a few days.

The prime consideration must be our responsibility to the American people. Whatever action we take must strengthen their confidence in the democratic process and in democratic government, a confidence that has been greatly undermined by the events of the past 2 years under the Nixon and Ford administrations.

We are all aware of the unprecedented character of the Rockefeller nomination. A self-impeached President, Richard Nixon, named as his successor Gerald Ford, the first nonelected President in the history of our Nation. President Ford, in turn, has nominated a man for Vice President who would be elevated to the second highest office in the land, again without benefit of a popular vote. Thus, the two highest officers of our Nation, for the first time, would be nonelected.

These are most unusual circumstances. It is ironic that both the confirmation of Gerald Ford as Vice President and the nomination of Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President should both be the first implementation of the 25th amendment to the Constitution because throughout the long deliberations that preceded adoption of this amendment, these circumstances were never discussed or even envisioned.

Last year, when I testified in opposition to the confirmation of Gerald Ford as Vice President, I noted that nowhere in the hearings or debate on the 25th amendment could any suggestion be found that it would be proper for a President who was the subject of a serious impeachment inquiry to name his successor.

The fact that Gerald Ford used his newly acquired Presidential powers to grant a sweeping, unprecedented and, in my view, illegal pardon to Mr. Nixon only strengthens my belief that it was inappropriate for Congress to allow Richard Nixon, in effect, to pick the next President of the United States. Are we now to compound this misjudgment by having the line of succession go from Mr. Nixon to Mr. Ford to Mr. Rockefeller, without any reference to the wishes of the electorate?

At the time of the Ford nomination,

I urged the Congress to take a different path rather than confirm a Vice President. I pointed out that for all its checks and balances and separation of powers among the three branches of Government, the Constitution is primarily designed to protect the predominance of the public will as expressed through elections. It would be an abuse of the intent of this amendment to allow it to be used to fill both Chief Executive offices without an election.

Accordingly, I introduced H.R. 11230, which amends title 3, United States Code, relative to Presidential succession, to provide that if the elected President and Vice President both leave office, the Speaker of the House would act as President only until a new election for President and Vice President was held, thus reaffirming the ultimate power of the people over the Government.

I believe that recent events have vindicated the need for such legislation and I intend to reintroduce it in the 94th Congress. With hindsight, we can certainly agree that the Nation would be in a much stronger position now to deal with the enormous problems of the economy and international relations if new national elections had been held and if the American people had been allowed to choose a national leadership in which they had confidence.

Traditionally, the President has been allowed to choose a compatible Vice President, presumably because the electorate requires assurance that the policies it voted for in the person of the President will be continued by his successor. But there is no popular mandate for either Mr. Ford or Mr. Rockefeller, or for their policies. Despite numerous opportunities during their long public careers, neither ever came close to winning a Presidential nomination and the most recent public opinion polls show that neither enjoys majority support.

The closest we have come to a determination of any kind of a public mandate is in the recent national elections, which certainly were an overwhelming repudiation of Watergate and of Mr. Ford's actions and policies to date. The men and women who will be seated in January were the winners in the first national election held since the Watergate scandal. If there is to be a vote on this nomination, it should be theirs. I therefore believe that no rule should be granted for a vote on the Rockefeller confirmation until the 94th Congress convenes.

It should also be recalled that under the 25th amendment, no deadline is imposed on the President in nominating a Vice President and no deadline is imposed on Congress for confirming a nomination. We are not expected to function simply as rubber stamps. We can reject as well as confirm. I also must register my objection to the atmosphere of inevitability that has been created around the Rockefeller nomination. Some Members have been quoted as saying, "If not Rockefeller, then who?" If in a democratic nation of 200 million people, only one individual can be found who is considered acceptable as Vice President, then we are in terrible trouble. In my view, that is a manufactured dilemma.

In the debate in the Senate last week on the Rockefeller nomination, Senator BIRCH BAYH, the author of the 25th amendment, explained that he was particularly conscious throughout long hearings and floor debate:

That in this one instance—

That is, the confirmation of a Vice President—the Congress would serve as surrogate electors: that, in fact, we were the vehicle through which our constituents' feelings were to be made known and that public sentiment was a critical element in the decisionmaking process for those of us called upon to vote.

He went on to say that—

While the legislative history of the amendment does not spell out the precise details of how each one of us is to reach that judgment, it does make it abundantly clear that it is a unique function we are called upon to perform and that its uniqueness stems, in large measure, from our responsibility to reflect upon the sentiments of those who, normally, have the right to make this decision for themselves.

Senator BAYH said that because of the long series of potential conflicts between Mr. Rockefeller's private interests and the public interest, the people of this country would not credit him with the ability to make an impartial decision and therefore would not have the necessary confidence of the American people.

He also pointed out that the 25th amendment requires the judicious consideration of all the facts before Congress votes on the confirmation of a Vice-Presidential nominee.

We do not have all the facts. Far from it, despite the apparently lengthy hearings held by the Senate and House. While this amount of time might suffice for an ordinary citizen, Mr. Rockefeller is no ordinary citizen. In fact, as I said in my testimony last month to the House Judiciary Committee, Nelson Rockefeller is a "partner in the greatest agglomeration of private power in the history of our Nation" and "Rockefeller power is entirely unique as a huge, interlocking complex of economic and other interests both here and abroad."

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I object to the gentleman in the well reading her remarks because she did not ask unanimous consent before she started to read her remarks, and that is according to Jefferson's Manual.

The SPEAKER. The question is: May the gentleman from New York read her remarks?

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York may proceed.

Ms. ABZUG. Mr. Speaker, I defend your right to speak but not to read your speech.

In addition to the innumerable points at which the public interest may collide with the private interests of the Rockefeller group, with its vast investments in oil, other sources of energy, utilities, transportation, banks, communications, chemicals, et cetera, a number of questions remain outstanding as to whether decisions made by Mr. Rockefeller during his 15 years as Governor of New York State benefited the special interests he associated with. In a letter to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I cited nine specific areas of conflict relating to gubernatorial decisions and actions. Those remain for the most part uninvestigated.

There is also strong evidence to indicate that Nelson A. Rockefeller during his tenure in office as Governor and following his resignation violated two sections of the New York State Penal Code and the New York State Public Officers Law by giving gifts and interest-free loans totaling almost $2 million to various public officials.

I have presented to the incoming district attorney of New York County outlining a "prima facie" case that Mr. Rockefeller did violate these laws. Until the district attorney of New York County makes a thorough investigation of the facts and the law and until it is determined whether Mr. Rockefeller is innocent or guilty of breaking the law, I believe it would be unwise for the House to proceed with a vote on confirmation.

If it does proceed to a vote, Congress may be placed in the highly awkward position of having elevated to the Vice Presidency a man who may be subject to a grand jury investigation and trial. The Nation would then find itself again involved in an all too familiar and repulsive discussion of whether a Vice President is immune from prosecution. Or, as appears more likely, if Mr. Rockefeller is confirmed, no investigation at all will be held, and large numbers of Americans will feel more than ever that equal justice has once again been subverted and that the rich and powerful are above the law.

I strongly urge the House to vote against the rule at this time. It should be left to the incoming Congress to decide whether it requires more facts before acting on the confirmation. It may also want to consider legislation on a special election, which I referred to earlier, and it may feel that it is necessary to revise the 25th amendment to prevent us from having a nonelected President and a nonelected Vice President.

For most of its 2 years in office, the 93d Congress has been immersed in the Watergate and impeachment inquiries. It is only fitting that we should allow the next chapter to be handled by the most recently elected representatives of the American people.

I urge a vote against the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I rise in support of the rule and for the confirmation of Nelson Rockefeller to be Vice President of the United States. Following upon the last statement made by the gentleman from New York and others, it seems to me that there is some confusion about the role of this Congress as to what our role really is today.

Wisely, the 25th amendment gave Congress the power of confirmation over the President's choice of who he wants to be Vice President. While this charges us with the responsibility to closely scrutinize a nominee, it does not empower us to make the selection ourselves. The 25th amendment clearly does not give the Congress authority to impose its own preference on the President. As a matter of fact, that approach was rejected during the debate on the floor of this Congress.

In the months of investigations and hearings, we have learned more about the President's choice for Vice President, Nelson Rockefeller, than we will ever know about most of our friends and our relatives; yet nothing that would disqualify the man from being Vice President has been found.

Obviously, some have found instances and circumstances they personally dislike; but, most have found a man of intelligence, who, aided by his vast experience, could make numerous, important contributions to this country as Vice President.

Our Nation has been too long without a Vice President and I, for one, am pleased that the question of confirmation is before us today and I will cast my one vote for confirmation, trusting that we will have a Vice President before the New Year.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered. The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 1511) confirming Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 1511) with Mr. NATCHER in the chair. The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the resolution was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) will be recognized for 2 hours, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HUTCHINSON) will be recognized for 2 hours, and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) will be recognized for 2 hours.

The Chair would like to state that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) will be recognized first; the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HUTCHINSON) will be recognized next; the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) will be recognized next. The Chair will alternate from side to side as we proceed through the general debate.

At this time, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO).

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues, barely 1 year and 13 days ago, this House met to consider the nomination of Gerald R. Ford to be Vice President.

At that time, the American Vice-Presidency was vacant for the 17th time in our history, but for the first time our Constitution has provided a mechanism by which to address such a vacancy—the 25th amendment, recommended by the Congress in 1965 and ratified by the States in 1967.

And as we exercised our responsibility under section 2 of that amendment 1 year ago, one fact certainly was very clear—a fact which recent history has only reaffirmed: that the responsibility with which we were charged was at its very heart the examination of a man's qualifications and fitness to hold the highest office in America, that of President of the United States.

That, of course, is the great responsibility facing us today. That is why the Committee on the Judiciary has inquired and deliberated for 17 long and searching weeks before making our studied recommendation to this House.

Nine Vice Presidents of the United States have succeeded to the Presidency during the unexpired term of an incumbent President. John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson, Chester Arthur, Theodore Roosevelt, Calvin Coolidge, Harry Truman, Lyndon Johnson, and Gerald R. Ford have all ascended to the Presidency during their terms as Vice President.

But at no time in our history, prior to the resignation of Richard Nixon, had any man become President without having first gone before a national electorate.

And at no time in our history, prior to the submission of this nomination, had any Congress, acting pursuant to the Constitution, been called upon to pass judgment on the nomination of a designated Vice President submitted by an unelected President.

That places a very special burden upon this House, and clearly enunciates the scope of our responsibility. It does not call into question the legitimacy of the nomination, but it does underscore the need to be careful and thorough.

At the same time, however, we are not afforded the luxury of an unnecessarily extended inquiry. The language of the 25th amendment makes clear that our responsibility exists simply "whenever" there is a vacancy; the language of the House and Senate reports in 1965 make clear that the intent of section 2 is to have a nomination considered promptly, and "to virtually assure us that the Nation will always possess a Vice President."

It is particularly important then that we act to fill this vacancy now.

We, as a nation, are confronted by growing problems all too real and familiar—we, as a nation, must look to leadership in the field of energy, in the battle against inflation and recession, and in the quest for peace in the Middle East and elsewhere. I believe those efforts could be severely impaired if we delayed, if we failed to act in an effort, at least, to give the President the help he has told us he needs.

Beyond that, Mr. Rockefeller, if confirmed, might conceivably bring to the Ford administration some of the competence and confidence it so urgently demands. The nominee has had of course years of diverse experience in both foreign and domestic affairs and has served several previous national administrations, Republican and Democrat, as well as the State of New York.

I cannot stand on this floor today, however, and state that my endorsement of this nomination has been an easy decision, or that it has been reached without long study and deep soul searching. I am aware of the opposition it has aroused on the part of many people who have raised serious questions. I personally have some disagreements with parts of Governor Rockefeller's record, and share with some of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee certain other reservations regarding his nomination.

I find myself particularly concerned with some of his actions and decisions in some of his later years as Governor. The tragic loss of life at the time of the Attica prison revolt is of special concern to me.

Then the previously undisclosed gifts and loans of vast sums of money are also troubling. More than errors of judgment, the Ronan, Miller, and Morhouse loans—among others—reveal at best a serious insensitivity to the uses of private money. Similarly, the publication of the Goldberg book in 1970 is a use of the family wealth that raises very legitimate concern.

But ought any disapproval of some of his actions, ought these misjudgments, which Mr. Rockefeller has recognized and pledged to avoid, constitute a bar to confirmation under the 25th amendment? I have concluded that when balanced against the nominee's experience and competence and the many good works that are a matter of public record—his total dedication to the public service—that they should not.

And I believe, most importantly, that these proceedings have been a very useful and salutary experience for Mr. Rockefeller. He has stated openly and candidly—and on several occasions—that he has been made to understand the seriousness of public concern and the realities of some of his own past insensitivities.

Our extensive hearing record, however, cannot change the fact that I am a Democrat and the nominee is a Republican. But it is without contest that the 25th amendment envisions, and assures, a procedure for the selection of a Vice President that is designed to give the President a person with whom he feels politically and ideologically compatible.

According to the legislative history of the amendment, the purpose of this procedure is to assure the country a Vice President of the same political party as the President, someone who would presumably work in harmony with the basic policies of the President.

Nelson Rockefeller, it seems to me, meets that test of compatibility. And so, again, despite any ideological differences he and I may have, I have concluded on the basis of all the evidence before us that Nelson Rockefeller is qualified and fit to be Vice President under the terms of the 25th amendment.

I make that judgment even while respecting the concerns of those who think that this nomination proposes an extraordinary combination of private economic power and public political power. There are those who feel that such a combination ought to be a disqualifying factor, except by election of the people. But this responsibility under the Constitution is not the people's, it is ours. And I believe that we would do a greater disservice if we established a principle that money—either too much of it or too little of it—prevents a man from serving in high public office.

Because the wealth of the Rockefeller family, however, is more than just another large fortune, because it is an unusual aggregation of private economic authority, the Judiciary Committee took great pains to examine the diversity of complex relationships and interrelationships that it creates. We have attempted to measure the network of Rockefeller family wealth and to place it into the perspective of both the American economy and the American political system; we have inquired of the nominee regarding a history of gifts, of loans, and of forgiven loans.

In order to help us do that, immediately after the submission of the President's nomination, the committee assembled a very able and responsible team of staff lawyers and investigators who traveled extensively in New York State and elsewhere. Here in Washington, every agency of the Federal Government was contacted and a request went out for all files in agency possession relating to the nominee.

The results of the committee's thorough investigative efforts were made available to the committee on a continuing basis before and during the hearings.

In addition, all members of the committee had access to, and were briefed on the information accumulated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Moreover, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, working with Judiciary Committee lawyers, conducted an independent audit of Mr. Rockefeller's income tax returns for the period covering the last 7 years. Gift tax returns were reviewed for a longer period. These additional materials were also available to the members.

Another team of committee lawyers, with the assistance and full resources of the Library of Congress, developed thorough analyses of the nominee's public record and positions on critical issues of public policy.

December 19, 1974

I believe the American people have been well served by these long hours of research and inquiry. The Judiciary Committee has held 9 full days and several evenings of public hearings. We have heard from two dozen witnesses, including the nominee himself on three separate occasions. Our hearing record comprises more than one thousand, four hundred pages. A more exhaustive inquiry of any nominee has probably never been made. That is perhaps as it should be for the Constitution subjects this appointment alone to the scrutiny of both Houses.

Finally, this decision, despite all our searching inquiry, would be easier for me if I were faced with a nominee of my own party and my own political philosophy. But given the limitations of the 25th amendment, I believe President Ford has provided an acceptable nominee, whose experience and administrative abilities will hopefully be brought to bear on the urgent national priorities now before us.

I shall vote aye on this nomination. I urge the House to adopt this resolution.

Before yielding to others, Mr. Chairman, I hope I can be permitted a moment to express my special appreciation to Mr. HUTCHINSON, our ranking minority member.

Throughout all of our painstaking proceedings—not only in this inquiry, but in others that have come before our committee in this 93d Congress—Mr. HUTCHINSON and the minority members have conducted themselves in the best traditions of the collegiality of this House. I know that the difficult work of the Judiciary Committee could not have been accomplished without their best efforts.

And to all members of the committee, and to my 20 colleagues on the Democratic side, I hope I can convey to you how very much your cooperation and counsel and hard work have meant to me over the past months of this Congress. It has been a high honor to be among you.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair notes a disturbance in the visitors' gallery, in contravention of the law and the rules of the House. The doormen and guards will remove from the gallery those persons participating in the disruption.

The Chair will remind all persons in the gallery that they are here as guests of the House and that any manifestation of approval or disapproval of proceedings is in violation of the rules of the House.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO).

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. MADDEN).

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I speak in behalf of the vast majority of the Members of this body in commending and congratulating the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and also the members of the Committee on the Judiciary on the outstanding and expert and magnificent job which that committee did over the weeks of hearings on this legislation.

Our local papers out in my area, and in fact, all over the country commended the chairman and the ranking minority member of this committee, as well as the members of the committee and the Congress, for the dignified legislative manner in which the Committee on the Judiciary conducted these most difficult hearings on Governor Rockefeller's Vice Presidential nomination.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. RODINO. I thank the gentleman from Indiana very much.

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODINO. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PATTEN. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in the remarks of our great speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and tell the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that his colleagues from New Jersey are proud of him. He has brought credit on all of us. He has come to this point with honor to the Congress, honor to his committee, and honor to all the Members of Congress.

We in New Jersey are proud of the job that the chairman and his committee has done.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much for his comments.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RODINO. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. I listened with great interest to the impressive details describing the standard by which the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary feels the nomination should be judged. Of course, I know, as the gentleman does, that he opposed the nomination of Gerald Ford for Vice President.

Has the gentleman changed his view as to what standard should be applied since he cast that vote a year ago, and does he criticize, in some way, those Members who feel a basic difference in the philosophy of government might be grounds for voting against the nominee?

Mr. RODINO. To answer the gentleman, no, I do not criticize them at all, nor have I changed my views.

Circumstances demand that a man exercise his conscience and vote in accordance with the way he feels. If Members feel that way, it is their privilege and their right to vote accordingly.

It was the privilege and the right of this Member, who a year ago felt very strongly, to cast his ballot accordingly.

I feel very strongly in this particular instance, and while I may have some reservations and disagreements, nonetheless, I believe it is in the best interests of our country to confirm the nominee, and since Mr. Rockefeller is completely qualified, I shall not only vote for him, but I urge the House that the confirmation be approved.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that the members of my committee have done, in my estimation, a remarkable job of being able to bring together the facts. Whether they support or do not support this nomination, I respect and admire them for their integrity and for the position that they take.

It is for that reason that I am glad that they will not be foreclosed from expressing their views. I believe it is only in this manner that the American people will have a full understanding of what this House of Representatives is all about.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. HUTCHINSON).

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, nearly 4 months ago Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York was nominated by President Ford to be the 41st Vice President of the United States. In that time the Committee on the Judiciary has conducted a searching investigation into the qualifications of the nominee. In fact, our efforts may have been the most thorough ever undertaken by any committee in a confirmation process. But as thorough as we were, nothing was found to cast doubt on the fact that Nelson Rockefeller is qualified to be Vice President.

Indeed, some members of the committee voted "no" when the roll was called in committee for various reasons. But they did not vote "no" because Nelson Rockefeller lacked executive and administrative experience. They did not vote "no" because Nelson Rockefeller failed to be a resourceful, dynamic Governor of New York. They did not vote "no" because Nelson Rockefeller lacked intelligence or knowledge or talent. Rather they voted "no" because Nelson Rockefeller has great wealth, because he didn't remember all the details involved in publishing the Goldberg book, because he commuted the sentence of a convict in bad health—which he should not have done apparently because the convict was once head of the Republican Party in New York—and because he made gifts and beneficial loans to many friends some of whom were State officials.

The ironic aspect of these arguments for voting against confirmation is that traditionally men of good character have viewed wealth, compassion, and generosity as advantages in a public official. One member of the committee, the gentleman from Texas, spoke to this point eloquently, saying:

I am inclined to think that you have a greater stake in this country than most people. It is to your own best interests that it be successful, that it be prosperous, that it be free. . . . (Hearings, 1025)

In my opinion the most revealing development of the committee's long inquiry has not concerned the nominee but rather those Members who would deny office to a person solely on the basis of his wealth. There is a critical difference between treating all men equal before the law and between equalizing all men. I am disappointed that this difference escapes some Members. In exercising our constitutional confirmation power I had thought that we were constitutionally precluded from discriminating on the basis of race, sex, religion, or economic status. Thus the only way the argument can rationally be made is not on the basis of the nominee's status as a wealthy man, but on the basis that the nominee would use his wealth against the common good of the American people. Yet such a basis finds no support in our lengthy record. Every bit of evidence runs counter to the argument. In fact, it almost seems as if Nelson Rockefeller has lived his whole life in a way to disprove that argument. There is utterly lacking any evidence that he ever benefited Rockefeller financial interests at the expense of the people. In contrast the record shows a man of great personal generosity giving much of his income each year to charity. In contrast the record shows a sincere, dedicated public servant for 40 years—a man, who although wealthy enough to lead a carefree existence, worked in the trenches at every level of government under both Republicans and Democrats, but always for the people. Why did he give so much of his money, his time, and himself for so long? Are we to believe that he did so much merely to lull us asleep so he could, after a long and brilliant career in government, betray his country to his family's economic interests?

The nominee's involvement in the publication of a political biography about Arthur Goldberg is another suggested basis for withholding confirmation, but the suggestion has been on the decline since the hearings before the Senate Rules Committee provided a forum for the nominee to answer accusations. At first we heard that the book was scandalous. But reading it laid that to rest.

Then we heard that the method employed to finance the book was designed to cover the nominee's involvement. Although it now appears that the nominee was not involved in financing the book and was unaware of how it was done, he candidly admitted that the method used by others was designed to disassociate the Rockefeller name. Next we heard that the nominee's revelations were slow and less than candid. The nominee then answered that he has always told the full truth as best as he could recollect it and that later revelations were not from his own experience, but the result of his current inquiry of others who were better informed. Since the answer seems to be a good one and there is no evidence to controvert it, resort was made to a smear that the answer was reminiscent of Watergate. So now that issue seems to be without substance.

Another basis for withholding confirmation which is frequently mentioned is Nelson Rockefeller's commutation of L. Judson Morhouse in 1970. As Governor of New York, Nelson Rockefeller had on several occasions commuted the sentences of convicts because incarceration was substantially impairing their health. Between his conviction in 1966 and the conclusion of appellate review in 1970, Morhouse suffered several medical catastrophes. He contracted Parkinson's disease, cancer of the rectum requiring removal of two-thirds of his large intestine, and then had his prostate gland removed. The evidence shows that no one with such a medical history had ever served a sentence in a New York penitentiary. Morhouse applied for clemency and submitted medical affidavits of four respected doctors attesting to his medical condition. Under New York law, the Governor has absolute discretion to grant a commutation. No legal standard need be met.

Governors, of course, prefer to appear reasonable, but on the record there was little reason to question a grant of clemency to this sick man, other than that L. Judson Morhouse had at one time been chairman of the Republican Party in New York. For that reason should this man have been required to serve his sentence? Apparently Nelson Rockefeller thought not. Although the case for clemency was already established, he asked the State medical society for independent verification of Morhouse's condition so that no one later could reasonably challenge the propriety of a commutation.

Three doctors were selected. Although only one doctor of the three made it through a blizzard to see Morhouse, all three consulted and agreed with the previous evaluation made by Morhouse's four doctors that L. Judson Morhouse's health would be substantially impaired by imprisonment.

And on the next day Mr. Morhouse and Mr. Wright received clemency for reasons of health. No one talks about Mr. Wright; he was never State chairman of the Republican Party.

Finally, it is suggested that confirmation should be withheld because the nominee made gifts and loans to public officials. It is argued that this was wrong whether or not it was legal to make such loans and gifts. Perhaps such loans and gifts would be cause for suspicion if made by someone other than the nominee. But Nelson Rockefeller's generosity is well known. For each year he gives a substantial portion of his income to charity, sometimes over 50 percent. And what is not noted by his detractors is that during the same period of time he made loans and gifts aggregating $1,692,219 to a total of 58 other people who were not State employees. As for the State employees, he testified that he made the loans and gifts to them as he made them to others—out of friendship. There is no evidence whatsoever contradicting the testimony. The New York laws do not prohibit making loans or gifts to friends who are State employees. Detractors argue that he did this to influence them. But this does not make sense because as governor the employees in question with one exception all served at his pleasure. By law they were already under his control.

Another fact often overlooked is that the New York laws in question did not become effective until January 1, 1966 and September 1, 1967, respectively, some time after many of the loans and gifts had been made. When this is mentioned, it is replied that it is normally wrong to make such gifts or loans even if it is legal. But if he gave out of friendship and not to influence them, I cannot comprehend the impropriety.

On two occasions the nominee made gifts or loans to individuals who were not residents of New York so that they could relocate in New York and become public officials there. But New York law does not prohibit such loans or gifts no more than it prohibits contributions to those seeking elective office. All that is prohibited is gifts or loans relating to past official conduct. Moreover, in one of the two instances, the law was not in existence at the time.

In conclusion, when the arguments against confirmation are examined, they appear to be without merit. It is perhaps because there is no really sound argument against the nominee that recourse is made to a "constitutional aside" that we must remember that Nelson Rockefeller was nominated by a President who was not elected. Of course, that argument if taken far enough is simply an argument against section 2 of the 25th amendment. However, the time to make such arguments is when we are amending the Constitution. That is when I made my argument against section 2. I do not think that we should hold a duly enacted constitutional procedure against the nominee because we are unhappy with its operation.

Moreover, I have not heard anyone complain that any bill signed into law by the President was not a law or that any veto was less of a veto because the President rose to that office without being elected by the electoral college.

The President is the President, and the mandate of section 2 could not be plainer. It is our duty to confirm or not confirm the nominee on the merits. The record indicates that the nominee is qualified to serve as Vice President. Although it is fair to say that we do not in each instance agree on the answers to the problems of our time, I find Nelson Rockefeller to be a man of integrity, ability, and experience. He is the choice of our President, and there is no reason to deny him that choice.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I would at the outset like to compliment my chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. ROBINSON) on the way he has conducted the hearings on the Rockefeller confirmation. The gentleman has been most fair to all of us.

Mr. Chairman, we meet today in these 6 hours to debate possibly the last important matter to come before this 93d Congress. In 6 hours, or 8, or 14, we would not be able to fully reach the parameters of this question. It is the case, as those who have preceded me have suggested, that we have a 1,400-page set of committee hearings replete with addendums, statistics, and graphs. We have countless expressions of opinion with reports and hearings. We also have available to us the reports of the national press and the media who have covered this question rather completely.

There are those who must, however, realize there are limitations both in time and in manner of presentation. What we do or say here this afternoon will not necessarily reach their question in its entirety.

Mr. Chairman, as we are aware, there are those Members who feel, for at least two reasons, that we ought not vote today but ought to continue this proceeding for either additional investigation on certain questions, or to permit a new Congress to exercise its will on the grounds that the election of November in and of itself serves as a referendum, at least in part, on the question of the Rockefeller nomination.

December 19, 1974

Regardless of the merit there may be in these reservations, the fact is we will reach a decision on this matter this afternoon.

The major question, it seems to me at the outset, is one's interpretation of the 25th amendment. Clearly, it cannot be purposeful if we are to confirm an individual for Vice President or for President of the United States as we would a Cabinet official. One year ago we considered the then pending nomination of Gerald Ford solely in the context of his serving as President of the United States and we must apply the same standards to this nomination.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 3 minutes.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that we stand as surrogates of the public in this matter and that we must view this nomination not solely in terms of constitutional qualifications or whether the FBI has reported to us that the nominee has not been convicted of a crime, is not a Communist, and that he is otherwise fit for office; but rather we must exercise our independent judgment. I submit further that that judgment includes a review of the policies of the nominee himself and the exercise of our own independent judgment as to whether not only is he fit, in terms of conflicts of interest because of his wealth, of possible mistakes in judgment and lack of candor, but whether his policies and his positions are sufficiently central so as to require us to vote in opposition or in affirmation.

We here this afternoon will not be able to debate fully the 25th amendment, but it seems to me the events of the last 2 years compel the next Congress to do so. One thing is certain. Under the 25th amendment we are not a rubber stamp for the President. We have a partnership in this nomination and the Congress must and will exercise its own point of view.

Mr. Chairman, the views of 10 or 12 members of the Democratic side of the Committee on the Judiciary are, of course, in the report. The 12 members constitute a majority of the majority of the committee. There are different perspectives represented by others, both members of the minority and members of the majority, and they will be reflected here this afternoon as they should be. In fact, Mr. Chairman, there may also be views of some American people in opposition to this nomination which will not be expressed here this afternoon. That is unfortunate. Nonetheless, in the context of this debate, we will at least hear both from those right of center and those left of center on questions relating not necessarily to judgment, to failings of the nominee in terms of fitness for office, and to the conflicts of his wealth, but in terms of policies advocated by the nominee.

This is appropriate and when it is completed, Mr. Chairman, I submit that Members of this House this afternoon ought to vote in opposition to this nomination.

Mr. Chairman, for the second time in a little more than a year, this House is being asked to vote to confirm a Vice President selected by the President under the provisions of the 25th amendment. This situation is particularly unique, however, in that we have a nominee selected by a President who was himself placed on the Presidential succession ladder through the provisions of the 25th amendment. We have learned through our first experience with the 25th amendment that Vice Presidential nominees must be judged as we would judge a prospective President. Thus, the burden placed on this House and this Congress through the 25th amendment is a great one.

We must serve as the voice of the people. We must act as surrogates for the people in determining who can best guide us through the difficult times facing this country. More than any other action we may take, our consideration of this nomination, like our consideration of its predecessor nomination, will determine, in part, the course this Nation will travel.

The Judiciary Committee conducted an exhaustive investigation into the record of Nelson Rockefeller. Like every other member of that committee, I weighed the testimony and the record carefully in considering this nomination. That Nelson Rockefeller is well qualified on the basis of his past Government service and record to become Vice President is obviously indisputable. Further, it is clear that he meets the constitutional requirements for this office. However, it is my belief that the 25th amendment places an obligation on us to go beyond his curriculum vitae in our examination of this nominee.

We all are aware that the criteria for our judgment is ill-defined. Lacking the normal barometer for judging a Vice Presidential or Presidential candidate, namely a public election, we are, thus, left with our own individual judgment and our own personally defined criteria. In this regard, we must view, with the broadest application of discretion, Mr. Rockefeller's record and make a judgment as to whether we approve of his policies.

Judging the testimony and the record, then, in that light, I shall cast my vote against confirmation of this nominee for several reasons.

First, I find far too many instances where Nelson Rockefeller's judgment must be called into question. One must question the propriety of the substantial gifts and loans made by Mr. Rockefeller to public officials. That he would seek to be a patron to public officials, who should be bound by public trust and the public interest, is of great concern to me.

The entire incident surrounding the Lasky book on Justice Goldberg and Governor Rockefeller's secret involvement in that incident, is greatly disturbing, particularly what I regard as a lack of candor on his part and that of his brother.

Mr. Rockefeller's judgment with regard to Attica raises grave doubts about this nominee. These are only a few examples, but added to the many others I find in the Record, they severely weaken Mr. Rockefeller's ability to command the public confidence and trust which a Vice President, or President, must have to function effectively.

Second, there is the entire matter surrounding the implications of the Rockefeller personal and family fortune, for I find the two to be inseparable. A review of their holdings indicates that they maintain a sizable personal influence in virtually every important aspect of American life—energy, transportation, banking, insurance, electronics and computers, metals, communications, chemicals, forestry and paper manufacturing, real estate, retail sales, pharmaceuticals, investment management, construction, and farm equipment manufacture. While this is an accurate catalog of the personal manifestations of their wealth, it does not nearly reflect the total sphere of influence which this family, through a marriage of interlocking directorates with other wealthy families and individuals, has built into an unrivaled financial and political empire which permeates our entire system.

With this nomination, we face the possibility of merging this tremendous economic power with the greatest political power held in this country. The scope of this private authority raises the serious question of whether or not Mr. Rockefeller, as President, would be able to distinguish between the private interest and the public good. The range of decisions which a President is daily called upon to make is so expansive and fundamental to the Republic's safe conduct that we cannot permit even the suggestion that there is a conflict between personal and public interest in the office of the President.

The current wave of public cynicism rests, in part, on the not-unfounded belief that the special interests and private concerns hold the counsel of the powerful, and that the interests of the people must wait in line while the influential have their say. The strength of our Government is drawn from the depth of its popular support. Never has the public confidence been more shallow and shaken than in these last few years. No matter how judiciously and honorably arrived at, every decision that a President Rockefeller would make would influence his and his family fortune. Even the most carefully considered decision would raise the specter of conflict of interest in the increasingly skeptical eyes of the public.

I am particularly concerned about this area, because the nominee has not responded adequately to it in his committee testimony. There seems to be both a lack of understanding on his part of the widespread suspicion that great wealth raises, and a certain arrogance of power that this issue of conflict could ever, indeed, apply to him. Mr. Rockefeller's promise to put his holdings in blind trust is hardly adequate. For, when the scope of the Rockefeller wealth is understood, one would have to be blind not to see it. It permeates every corner of American life from Main Street to Wall Street. Mr. Rockefeller could hardly hide it from himself, let alone from the huge bureaucracy which historically is always in tune to the President's interests.

In all candor, I must admit that I find no specific instance of any conspiracy on Mr. Rockefeller's part to advance his economic position at the expense of those he would publicly serve. Yet, the perception of such self-interest motivations will exist in the public mind.

The public views the Rockefeller fortune with a jaundiced eye for other important reasons. Nelson Rockefeller, while a decent and honorable man, represents the inherent inequities in our system. The family wealth is synonymous with all that is exploitative in the economic system of our Nation. It represents a system and a body of laws that have been so designed over the years as to enhance the power of the powerful, increase the wealth of the wealthy, and perpetuate the influence of the influential.

Our experience of the last couple of years has placed an obligation on us to do everything we possibly can to renew public confidence and trust in Government. This nomination can only further shake that confidence and erode that trust.

Finally, I am greatly concerned with the Governor's view of the role of the military in American life and with his apparent total willingness to tolerate what I consider to be "dirty tricks" as a necessary tool of Government at home and abroad.

Mr. Rockefeller has a record of long-standing and continuing support of almost every manifestation of American military power. He was an ardent supporter of American involvement in the Southeast Asian war, and continues to this very day to support American financial assistance to the corrupt dictatorship of General Thieu. He has a long record of endorsement of almost every demand the U.S. Military Establishment has made on the resources of this Nation.

But, particularly disturbing to me is Mr. Rockefeller's view of what I consider totally illegitimate Government activities in foreign countries and here at home. The record shows that Governor Rockefeller believes that the continuance of CIA covert operations into internal affairs of foreign nations is a legitimate expression of American foreign policy. It also reveals the nominee's apparent insensitivity to the necessity of protecting the basic human and constitutional rights of American citizens, particularly when they are endangered by official Government actions such as the FBI COINTELPRO operations, or those subversive White House activities for which the Judiciary Committee recommended articles of impeachment against former President Nixon.

We have had quite enough experience with the type of outlook that says anything can be justified in the name of national security. Our rights have been trampled upon and the sovereignty of foreign nations has been violated. Our reputation at home and abroad has been severely tarnished. In my view, we must exercise the greatest care to make certain that the kind of philosophy that caused our national trauma is not perpetuated. I fear, however, that this is the philosophy of Nelson Rockefeller, and I must reject it.

I hold no personal animus toward Nelson Rockefeller. It seems apparent that he will be confirmed by the House, notwithstanding my own views, and I wish him well in his prospective new position. However, for the above reasons, I cannot in good conscience support this nomination.
